The Tariff After the War—What the United States Is Up Against.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. IRA G. HERSEY.

OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, December 9, 1919,

On bill (H. R. 10918) to provide revenue and encourage domestic industries by the elimination, through the assessment of special duties, of unfair foreign competition, and for other purposes.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to prevent, if possible, unfair competition from abroad when goods are sold here in competition with the products of this country, and is called "the antidumping measure."

"Dumping" is defined to be—the practice of flooding an area of trade with a commodity to be sold at prices far below the cost of production, for the purpose of driving competitors out of business. When competition has been thus destroyed, the prices are raised to a point which will take care of all past losses.

The Knickerbocker Press, of Albany, N. Y., says:

The United States ought not to be simple-minded enough to allow this game to go on. It can be halted effectively, so far as our home markets are concerned, by a prohibitive tariff upon goods sent here for the purpose of breaking down American industries. This will bar nothing which is offered in our markets with an honest purpose.

When the Underwood free-trade bill was enacted in 1913 the Nation was greatly alarmed by the fact that all tariff barriers by that bill were taken down between us and other nations, so that the United States would become a dumping ground for the surplus of all foreign nations, and to meet this objection and quiet the people the Democratic Party enacted what was known as the antidumping bill, which they claimed would prevent any nation from dumping its goods onto us, so as to destroy American industries.

We all remember in the presidential campaign of 1916, when the serious results of free trade were before the people and it was shown that the free-trade nations would use us as a dumping ground to destroy American industries, that the Democratic Party answered this by saying that they had enacted an effective piece of legislation called the "antidumping" measure, which would protect our Nation from any such dire results, and this statement on too many occasions satisfied the people.

The World War came after 10 months of free trade, and that war effectively closed the gates and erected barriers against all foreign importations, and down to the present time it has saved the interests of the United States from an influx of the products of cheap labor.

Now, for the first time we have discovered that there was a joker in the antidumping legislation of the Democratic Party, and that the law was no good, ineffective, and unworkable. The able leader of the Democratic Party in the House, Mr. KITCHIN, of North Carolina, in speaking to-day on the pending bill, said:

An antidumping proposition is not a new one. The Democrats were the first to introduce and to pass an antidumping proposition.

* * * * * * *

The Tariff Commission declare that it is not workable, for the reason that it is almost impossible to show the intent on the part of the importer to injure or destroy business in the United States by such importation and sale.

That is the trouble with this antidumping act of 1916, which is now the law. You have to show the intent of the foreigner, the intent of the importer, to injure or destroy some particular industry in the United States.

This Democratic antidumping law was never intended to work. It was not enacted for that purpose; it is a subterfuge, and no attempt has ever been made to enforce it, and none would have been made to correct it had the Democrats in Congress continued in power. Now the Republicans offer a real antidumping measure that will effectively prevent any dumping of foreign goods upon our shores to destroy American industries, although I must admit I have very little faith in the enforcement of this law at the present time through a Democratic free-trade Secretary of the Treasury.

The President in his late annual message serves notice upon Congress that we must not revise the tariff, and we understand that if we attempt to do so we will meet his veto. His position is well understood. Among his 14 conditions of peace and in his subsequent speeches he says that we should provide for the "removal of all economic barriers and the establishment of equality of trade conditions," the "freedom from economic serfdom," and "any form of economic exclusion," and "the prevention of all economic rivalries in definite and binding terms."

The Worcester (Mass.) Telegram, speaking of the tariff arrangement of the League of Nations, says:

If Americans do not watch out, the League of Nations will be founded on free trade. The United States will lose its legs if not its head. Its billion-dollar ships will be fine junk. Instead of being able to feed the world it will be the receiving committee of charity to feed its people. Labor will be paid on the Chinese basis. The bundle tying and the bungling will be done at Versailles. How many business Americans will be there? Not one who has ever made a tariff protective law or a dollar under any other kind of law.

The late Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, in a recent speech said:

When the war shall close, the public control of railroads in foreign lands, the semiofficial chambers of commerce, the publicly fostered organizations which control great industries will all exist and will be used in an effort to recover lost commerce. The outreach of American industries—nay, their very existence in our land in some cases—will be resisted to the full, and every strategem of industrial war will be excited against them.

It becomes, therefore, vitally necessary that Congress should at once close the gates against the dumping of foreign goods into our markets at the present time. The President can not object to a correction of this Democratic legislation so as to make it workable, so we do not expect any veto of this measure. This, however, is as far as we can go, for in his recent message the President said in substance that the only way the foreign nations that owe us can pay their bills is by sending to us goods. In other words, we must increase our imports from Europe in order that she can pay us her great indebtedness. The bars must come down; the gates must be opened; protection must be swept away, so that Europe may enrich herself and pay her indebtedness at the further expense of the United States. This is the future policy of the Democratic Party as set forth by the President.

The New York Evening Post recently said:

Of course this Nation resists interference with its protected industries when such opposition pulls down the barriers between the high-wage scale of America and Europe. If the policy of protection is a handicap to the people, why are we the only country that has no emigrants? Why is American labor better paid, better clad, better educated, and more contented than any on the face of the earth? Well-paid labor can not compete with cheap labor. In the contest the former will go to the wall.

Let it be plainly understood that the policy of the present administration in the matter of our trade with foreign nations is the "removal of all economic barriers," unlimited opportunities for all nations to use us as the dumping ground of cheap pauper labor-made goods that they may recover from the effects of the war and return to prosperity at the expense of American industries and American labor.

The Republican floor leader, Mr. MONDELL, a few days ago said:

Shall the Nation do its own work, or shall the work of the Nation be done by the underpaid peoples of the Orient? Shall we make these products in America, or shall they be made by Japanese? When you state that question you state the whole tariff question. Shall America do its work, or shall we allow the oriental, with his low rate of pay and his low standard of living, do it? In that event, who is going to furnish employment for the people of America, and how shall we maintain the American wage and the American standard of living? The gentleman from North Carolina pettifogged a lot when he referred to the relative costs of the production of buttons in Japan and America. After all is said and done, one does not need to split hairs when it comes to the question of competition between American labor and oriental labor.

Our foreign trade for 1916 and 1917 amounted to a total of $17,000,000,000. Our loss of revenue during the first 10 months of the Underwood free-trade bill, prior to the war, amounted to over $62,000,000. As we are approaching a time of peace, shall we forget the lessons of the past and allow Europe to fatten on the industries of America under the plea of the President that this is the only way they can pay their indebtedness to us? I indorse the sentiments of the New York Sun, in a recent issue. When speaking of the President's message upon this point, it said:

Better—a thousand times better—that our debtors should never pay us, that we should cancel the obligations, that we should forget them and go on our way, with the most precious of all things preserved for our own people and for their children after them—the chance for every willing man to earn an honest living in the most blessed land under the skies.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. MASON,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, December 2, 1919.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I can not understand why this mistaken policy of the Government should be continued, of discriminating against the National Guard and others who went in to fight and risk their lives for their country, and in favor of those who enlisted in times of peace. As an illustration of the discrimination against the enlisted man I called attention before to the case of Lieut. Barlow, who, upon the loss of his foot, receives compensation of $7.50 a month. This is all the money he received from the Government except the $60 bonus. This young man earned his decorations in active service, where he lost his foot, while his friend and comrade enlisted at the same time and was made a first lieutenant in the Regular Army. He was overtaken by flat feet here in Washington, is returned as a first lieutenant with pay amounting to more than $120 a month for life.

In answer to my letter the Secretary of War stated that it was the policy of the Government to encourage the people to enlist in times of peace and for that reason they give to the Regular Army this advantage, which is not given to the National Guard or the National Army. By some law or ruling, I am informed, that the Marine Corps service and in the Navy, the temporary officers have been retired at three-fourths pay for disability, and why in the name of common honesty this discrimination against the National Guard should continue I can not understand. Is the General Staff, which is made up of the Regular Army, in control of the legislative branch of this Government? To be perfectly frank, I think it is, for the bill I introduced to treat the National Guard the same as the Regular Army in cases of disability, is sleeping in the Committee on Military Affairs, and all that I ask of that committee is to report the bill either favorably or unfavorably, and not to continue this smothering process by which they refuse the Congress the chance to vote on the bill. I do not ask that my bill be reported, so long as any bill by anyone be reported which gives us the chance to get a vote on this proposition of the policy announced by Secretary Baker and the General Staff, which continues to discriminate against the volunteer soldier.

No one wants to take anything away that is now given the Regular Army officer or marine officers or officers of the Navy who get the benefit of retirement by reason of disability. We do not ask to take anything from them, and yet you would think, to hear some of them talk here, that it was going to be a hardship upon the Regular Establishment to deal justly with the volunteer.

Using the language of the War Department, which seems to be adopted by the Military Affairs Committee, that because officers of the Civil War outside of the Regular Army were not accorded the right to be retired, that therefore "it is improper." In other words, because for 50 years we have discriminated against the volunteer soldier of the Civil War, we must continue to discriminate against all volunteer soldiers. The sum and substance of the whole rule is: The Government says to the young man to go to West Point or Annapolis, be educated at the expense of the Government, and be given steady employment all your life, with all the dangers incident to peace, and if anything happens to you in the way of disability or upon reaching a certain age, you shall be retired in comfort and provided for as long as you live. At the same time, we say to the young man who, when he hears his country call, drops all his ambitions, throws aside all his prospects, throws his life into the balance for his country's sake, we say to him, "Young man, if you get to be a lieutenant and are promoted for bravery in action, you must understand that in case of disability you will take your 25 or 50 per cent of $30 a month, and you can, if your health permits, stand on the street corner and solicit alms from the passers-by." This is the most inhuman proposition ever made by this country, and sooner or later it may be well for you statesmen to know that the volunteer will be heard in this Chamber, and it is to be hoped that he will have influence enough at least to pry the bill for justice out of the clutches of the committee, now dominated by the General Staff.

Mr. Speaker, another bill which I shall speak briefly about: What has become of the bonus which we have talked so much about for the returned soldier? Talking with some of the leaders on both sides of this House, I was informed that we must wait before passing the bill until the American Legion shall meet. In other words, they want us to become hand washers and "pass the buck"; that is, dodge our responsibility and let some one in Minneapolis tell us what to do.

And when they adjourned in Minneapolis, I am informed that they took no action on the question of bonus. I can understand why the soldiers making up the American Legion do not want to ask for the bonus, for they might have some delicacy in asking, and for that reason I think we should be more prompt in giving it. Others who are shrieking for economy say it would be too much like charity. Let it be understood once for all that anything the Government can do for the soldier carries with it the badge of honor and not the badge of charity. Was it charity when we made new generals and new admirals? Not one of your cheeseparing committees called it charity. Is it charity to pay pensions to the men of the Grand Army of the Republic and the Spanish War veterans? The man who says so has not the least conception of patriotism. When we made a bonus here for our Government employees of $240 a year so that they could take care of the high cost of living, no one called that charity. We all agreed that it was an act of justice.

Our boys came home from service and were discharged with that magnificent bonus which was nearly enough to buy them a suit of clothes. They were suddenly thrown back into civil life, many of them to find their positions gone. But wherever they are and whatever they are doing, the high cost of living is on them the same as on the rest of us. Thousands of them have fulfilled their engagements to marry, have bought a little furniture on time; thousands of them are still unemployed, and a sandwich this winter is worth more to them than a banquet two or three years from now in the shape of lands which they can not cultivate.

While I have proposed the issue of a bond of $500 to be called the honor service bond, I am free to say that I have no pride of opinion and am willing to vote for any of the half dozen bills which have been introduced by my colleagues upon this subject. If there is any soldier who thinks that it is charity and that he does not want charity there is nothing to compel him to take it, but he ought not to stand in the way of the thousands of our good, hard-working boys who were taken away from their business, used as long as we wanted them for German targets, and then turned back into the whirlpool of labor and commerce, and then told that a few years from now we are going to pass some land legislation that may possibly be of benefit to 5 per cent of the American soldiers.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to give respectful notice to those gentlemen who prevent us from having a vote on this subject, the gentlemen who are in control of the committees of this House are taking a grave responsibility upon themselves in refusing to give us a chance to consider such a measure in the Committee of the Whole. I am familiar with the old method of killing legislation by preventing a vote upon it, but that time is passing, and the gentlemen who prevent us from having a vote upon that measure will have to account to their constituents.

There is another bill pending which gives to the private soldier and sailor the right to form a legion. This takes in privates and noncommissioned officers. Why can not this be done as cheerfully as we gave to the American Legion a charter. This could not injure the American Legion. Suppose all of the lieutenants wanted to form an organization, or all of the cooks or the nurses, why not give them all an even chance. These organizations in the past, the Grand Army, the Spanish War Veterans, and affiliated organizations have been a very fountainhead for teaching patriotism and loyalty. The Sons of the American Revolution and the Daughters of the same, the Grand Army of the Republic, the women of the Grand Army of the Republic, the Sons and the Daughters of the Grand Army of the Republic, the Spanish War Veterans and their affiliated organizations, and now the American Legion are all the promoters of the doctrine of our Americanism, and the more we have the better, and I wish very earnestly to indorse the statement of the great soldier and statesman, Gen. SHERWOOD, of Ohio, that the private soldiers and sailors and noncommissioned officers may be given the advantage of having an organization.

I am by request of that organization printing here as a part of my remarks their declaration of principles:

NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS OF THE PRIVATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS LEGION,
810 F Street, Washington, D. C.

DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES.

The Private (the word "Private" as used in this document intends to cover those enlisted men in the Army and Navy who are not commissioned officers) Soldiers and Sailors Legion is an organization of and for the private soldiers, sailors, and marines only.

The purpose of the legion is to unite all privates of the United States Army and Navy who served in the World War into one fraternal union for the mutual protection of their rights, the advancement of their interests, the promotion of their welfare, and the fostering and aiding of cordial, social, and fraternal relations among those who served as privates in the United States forces during the World War in the years from 1917 to 1919, inclusive, and to secure forever the blessings of liberty and peace to ourselves and all our fellow citizens of the United States of America.

These benefits of organization can only be accomplished by definite practical steps taken by the united action of the great body of the private soldiers and sailors themselves.

The successful achievement of the demands of the Private Soldiers and Sailors Legion will not only be immediately and permanently helpful to those who wore the uniform, but will be of the greatest benefit to the prosperity, security, and welfare of all the people of the United States. It was by the laws and action of the United States Government that upon the private soldier, sailor, and marine were placed the burdens, hazards, and losses of the World War. Only by the laws and action of the United States Government can these burdens be removed and those hazards and losses to some extent be compensated.

To this end we demand that the United States Government shall promptly enact legislation to provide employment at once for all demobilized soldiers, sailors, and marines who are unable to find employment in private business. The first demand of the demobilized men of the United States service is the opportunity for employment for all.

To tide over the change from military to civil life we shall ask Congress to appropriate $500 to be paid to each private upon his discharge from the service. This payment to be made to those who are already discharged upon the passage of the law.

Thousands of soldiers were subject to needless hardships and privations by the unjustly heavy fines and penalties imposed on soldiers by the incompetent and unfit officers in courts-martial for insignificant, petty infractions of military regulations. Congress should at once take the necessary action to see that these fines for petty offenses should be promptly repaid to the honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, and all court-martial sentences should be reviewed, that justice may be done.

We demand prompt action by Congress to open up for demobilized soldiers, sailors, and marines the opportunity to employ their labor on the unused lands and natural resources of our country. And we don't want to be confined to swamp lands, cut-over stump lands, and desert lands, either. We hold that the hundreds of millions of idle acres of good agricultural, mineral, and timber lands and vacant city lots are none too good for the use of the soldiers who are conceded to have saved civilization at $30 per month minus large reductions for fines, insurance, etc.

We seek no crumbs of private charity; we accept no dole of public alms; we know our rights and we demand them like men.

We do not purpose to be used as crowbars to pry some other man or woman out of a job. Nor do we intend to be recruited into an army of unemployed to be used as a lever to force down the wages of other citizens. Nor do we intend to starve or beg. Nature's bounty has provided Uncle Sam and all his nephews with ample opportunity for all to work if the Government will only let down the bars of monopoly and privilege.

We reaffirm the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States of America and the reestablishment of the rights of free speech, free press, and peaceable assemblage guaranteed by that Constitution. And we recognize the duty of the men and women of our times in this Republic to carry on to full completion the work begun by our forefathers by establishing on a sure foundation the last and greatest of the rights of man—economic liberty—without which all the other forms of freedom fail.

NATIONAL INCORPORATION.

This constitution is adopted conformably to the act of the Congress of the United States of America of date September 16, 1919.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON LEGISLATION OF THE NATIONAL CONVENTION OF THE AMERICAN LEGION.

Your committee submits the following report, embodying recommendations of the committee covering the method by which the national organization shall carry into effect the decisions of the national convention affecting national legislation as well as recommendations to the States covering the promotion of appropriate legislation in several States:

1. Your committee recommends that the national commander appoint a committee on legislation, whose duty it shall be to represent the American Legion in Washington, and that such committee be authorized to establish a Washington bureau, rent offices, and employ such personnel as it deems necessary for the furtherance of the legislative program of the American Legion.

2. Your committee further recommends that the national adjutant or secretary be instructed to send copies of all resolutions adopted by this convention on the subject of national legislation to each State adjutant or secretary; that each State adjutant or secretary be directed to send copies of such resolutions to each local post; and that each local post be directed to use its best efforts to facilitate the enactment of such proposed legislation through contact with the Member of Congress from their district or the United States Senators.

3. Your committee recommends that each State organization be directed to appoint a legislative committee in such manner as the State organization may elect, with such powers as may be necessary to facilitate the enactment of legislation before its State legislators.

Your committee ratifies and approves the work conducted by the national legislative committee of the American Legion at Washington and directs that the following statement be included as a part of this report:

The national legislative committee of the American Legion, consisting of Luke Lea, of Tennessee, and Thomas W. Miller, of Delaware, joint chairmen, was authorized in June, 1919. The first work of this committee was to obtain from Congress an act incorporating the American Legion as a national corporation. Such a measure was introduced on June 27, 1919, and became a law on September 16, 1919. The rapid passage of this measure through both Houses of Congress is significant of the strength of the American Legion among our national legislators.

To carry out the recommendation of the St. Louis caucus on the subject of alien slackers proper measures were introduced and pushed by your committee. A bill providing for the deportation of naturalized citizens or aliens convicted under the espionage act has already passed the House and favorably reported by a Senate committee. Concerning those slackers who withdrew their first citizenship papers when called upon to serve the country, a measure was introduced and properly advocated through public hearings, but due to purporting infringement of treaty rights the State Department has opposed the enactment of it.

The bill amending the war-risk insurance act in the manner advocated by the legion has passed the House and is now pending before the Senate Committee on Finance.

The legion's interest in the treatment of disabled soldiers and the deplorable conditions existing in connection with this matter has received attention of the national legislative committee, with a view to an early bettering of the conditions of disabled men.

Your committee has cooperated with the congressional committee investigating the conduct of the war with a view to bringing speedy justice to officers and men who were responsible for the diabolical treatment meted out to our soldiers in prison camps abroad and in this country, and for future investigation in connection therewith.

The American Legion has obtained amendments to the proper bills which provide that civil-service preference be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines in Federal position throughout the country.

The American Legion desires that the officers and enlisted personnel who served in this war and who were disabled retire under the same conditions as the men under the Regular Establishment, and have been advocating, through the legislative committee, appropriate legislation of this character.

There has been close cooperation between the legion representatives and the War Department in the matter of reemployment of ex-service men.

There are numerous other matters with which the legislative committee has dealt in Washington, but in whatever work the committee is engaged it has only reflected the will of the individual members of the American Legion as expressed through the temporary National and State organizations.

Respectfully submitted.

NEWTON JENKINS, of Illinois, Secretary.

REPORT OF NATIONAL COMMITTEE ON POST ACTIVITIES AND MEMORIALS.

NATIONAL CONVENTION AMERICAN LEGION.

1. Keep the preamble before the members. It tells them what the American Legion stands for.

2. The matter of post activities should be left entirely to the local post, with the proviso that matters of policy affecting the American Legion be passed on by the State or National organization.

3. Each State organization shall appoint a committee on post activities and welfare, whose duty it shall be to recommend to local posts stimulating influences for membership such as entertainment, athletics, social events, interpost competitions, etc.

4. We recommend that space be devoted in the American Legion Weekly to the publication of post activities, setting forth what the different posts accomplish throughout the country in making their post activities attractive.

5. We recommend that the national executive committee fix a national American Legion week at which time the National, State, and local organizations shall concentrate through all mediums of publicity to further by personal solicitation an enrollment membership campaign to be carried on by each local post in the country.

6. We recommend that May 30 be designated as the American Legion Memorial Day and that the American foreign legations in countries where our dead comrades rest be instructed through the proper departments at Washington to cause fitting memorial services to be held.

7. We recommend the consideration of a memorial to our soldier dead in France to the national executive committee, to be reported upon at the next annual convention.

8. We recommend that each State individually determine for itself the nature, form, and construction to be used in memorials erected to their fallen comrades.

9. The American Legion is to take decisive measures against the illegal use of the American uniform, and to prevent all misuses of the said uniforms.

REPORT OF EMPLOYMENT COMMITTEE.

NOVEMBER 11, 1919.

Your committee on employment offers for your consideration the following resolutions:

Resolution 1.

Whereas considerable numbers of discharged service men are not placed in employment suitable to their abilities or needs and large numbers of service men are in need of help and information regarding many matters other than employment: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Legion in national convention assembled does hereby urge that the efforts that are now being made by the service and information branch, or such other agency as may be established, be continued under its present arrangement until the situation as to unemployed service men shall have been corrected and the number reduced to normal condition; and further be it

Resolved, That the American Legion, each State organization, each local post, and each individual member be urged to cooperate in every way possible with the service and information branch in the office and agency they maintain to provide for the adequate handling of employment for discharged service men; and further be it

Resolved, That funds to maintain and to develop these agencies under the service and information branch of this office of the Assistant Secretary of War, were it not otherwise already provided for, be so provided for by appropriation of Congress as an emergency measure; and further be it

Resolved, That all civilian clerks or employees required for the work be ex-service men who have secured an honorable discharge; and further be it

Resolved, That National, State, and local welfare agencies maintaining service of any nature for the benefit of the former ex-service men be urged to continue activities during the present period of uncertainty and unrest; and further be it

Resolved, That the question of employment, as regards the American Legion, will become after the period of organization of the legion, a matter concerned among members of the legion only, and that after such period of organization it shall become a matter of responsibility for each post to assure itself that no member of such post is unemployed.

Resolution 2.

Whereas the Government, even more than private employers, owes an obligation toward its discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines to afford them an opportunity to earn a proper living, particularly in the case of those who have suffered any permanent disability; and

Whereas military experience and training have made the veterans of the World War better able to render loyal and efficient service in public employment; and

Whereas the American Legion desires to uphold high standards of governmental service and to avoid fostering the claim of the unfit and the undeserving under color of patriotism: Be it

Resolved, That the American Legion, in national convention assembled, declares its belief that in making or providing for appointments to position in the civil service, National and State Governments, by legislative or other appropriate action, should allow a preference over candidates otherwise equally qualified to veterans of the World War and to the widows of those who laid down their lives in the service; and be it further

Resolved, That the several civil service commissions should be authorized and directed to provide in the regulations governing all civil service tests that special recognition be given to patriotism, discipline, and similar military virtues, and that, in the rating of candidates under those headings, a certain percentage must be allowed to all the veterans of the World War; and be it further

Resolved, That the veterans of the World War who, through wounds or otherwise, have been permanently incapacitated by their military service should have absolute preference for appointment to any civil service position for which their physical disability does not otherwise disqualify them.

Resolution 3.

Whereas the American Legion in all of its branches has occasion to employ the services of various clerks, typists, and stenographers; and

Whereas these organizations of the American Legion have heretofore employed assistants who were not members of the legion; and

Whereas all concerns throughout the country have been asked by the American Legion to employ ex-service men and women wherever possible, and the American Legion in some instances has not as yet set the example to this end: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the American Legion in all its branches employ, wherever possible, the services of American Legion members in good standing; and be it it further

Resolved, That the present staffs of the National, State, and county organizations be so altered as to conform to this resolution.

It having come to the attention of the American Legion that there are now being employed in the various quartermaster depots and Navy commissary stores of our country men who are not ex-service men: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the American Legion condemns the hiring or continuance in service in said quartermaster depots and Navy commissary stores of said men, and insist that ex-service men be employed exclusively in these positions.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be furnished to the War and Navy Departments, to the various welfare agencies concerned, and to the public press.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

NOVEMBER 12, 1919.

To the American Legion National Convention:

Your committee on war-risk insurance reports as follows:

This committee has taken as its charter the following mandate of the convention:

"To recommend how ex-service persons may receive the most efficient assistance from the American Legion, the National, State, and post organization, and also to recommend what improvements in legislation and administration, if any, should be urged upon the Government."

War risk is a good name with a bad history. But under your mandate we have conceived that it was our duty not to condemn the past, but to build the future.

To accomplish this end, and realize all possible benefits from the war-risk insurance act, your committee submits three classes of recommendations:

First. What Congress shall do.
Second. What the American Legion shall do.
Third. What the War Risk Bureau shall do.

I. WHAT CONGRESS SHALL DO.

1. Pass the Sweet bill (H. R. 8778).

This bill, passed by the House and pending in the Senate, provides increased compensation for disabled men; extends the classes of persons to whom insurance may be payable, including the insured's estate; provides payment of converted insurance in a lump sum or installments covering three years or more, at the option of the insured.

2. Pass the Wason bill (H. R. 10365).

This bill gives the Bureau of War Risk Insurance authority (a) to establish 14 regional offices; (b) to advertise in newspapers and periodicals, in order to acquaint all with their rights under the war-risk act; (c) to receive payment of premiums through post offices, and appropriates $2,000,000 for these purposes.

3. We recommend that Congress do not pass the Harding-McCulloch bill.

This bill provides that for two years after discharge ex-service men be not required to pay insurance premiums.

Your committee deems this bill in effect a bonus, which, if it is to be given by Congress, should be done directly and not indirectly, and not in a manner destructive of one of the purposes of the war-risk act.

4. As new legislation we recommend that Congress pass laws to attain the following objects:

(a) To extend the principles of the Sweet bill so that term insurance as well as converted insurance shall be payable at option in a lump sum.

(b) To eliminate all restrictions as to the class of permitted beneficiaries.

(c) Relieve from payment of premiums on term insurance those persons who are receiving hospital care under the Bureau of War Risk Insurance; those persons in vocational training during the period of their training; and those persons temporarily totally disabled, retroactive to October 6, 1917; also to provide without charge hospital and medical care for all honorably discharged service men for one year from the date of their discharge.

(d) To combine the Federal Board for Vocational Training with the Compensation Division of the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

5. Your committee has given full consideration to the suggestion already heard upon the floor of this convention that war-risk premium rates be reduced. In considering this subject we have had the benefit of arguments by the honored chairman of this convention, former Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, the arguments of Judge Vance and Prof. Dowling, former counsel of the bureau; of R. G. Cholmeley-Jones, the present director; and William McFarlane, actuary of the bureau; and after full hearing and discussion we recommend the following resolution:

"Whereas there appears just basis for a belief that dividends accruing from converted war-risk insurance will be sufficient to warrant an eventual reduction in rates: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Congress and the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to make an actuarial ascertainment of the true cost of war-risk insurance as determined by experience, to the end that rates be revised to actual mortality cost."

II. WHAT THE AMERICAN LEGION SHALL DO.

Launch an active campaign to obtain at once for ex-service men and their dependent relatives the benefits of the war-risk act, and to that end that there be provided by each State organization of the legion a war-risk officer, paid if possible, who shall immediately organize his State through the local posts in order to bring about prompt adjustments and settlements with the War Risk Bureau, and that this campaign be given active cooperation by the American Legion publication; and, further, that there be furnished to these officers and each of the legion posts, the addresses of which shall be furnished the bureau, copies of all publications, informative literature, rulings, and instructions issued by the War Risk Bureau.

III. WHAT THE BUREAU OF WAR RISK SHALL DO.

Employ more ex-service men at the bureau, give prompter attention to inquiries directed to the bureau, and get busy!

Respectfully submitted.

GILBERT BETTMAN, Chairman.
FLOYD WINGO, Secretary.

REPORT ON BENEFICIAL LEGISLATION ON VOCATIONAL EDUCATION AND COMPENSATION FOR THE WOUNDED AND DISABLED SERVICE PERSONS.

NOVEMBER 12, 1919.

Your committee on beneficial legislation met and organized Monday afternoon at 4 p. m., and after several sessions of many hours' duration submits the following unanimous report:

First. That we memoralize Congress and urge that the appropriation of all necessary funds to properly carry on the work of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, as needed by the board, be made promptly.

Second. The committee recommends that the immediate passage of bill H. R. 8778, known as the Sweet bill, be urged upon Congress, amending, however, the compensation features so as to include the same family allowances as authorized in section 204 of the war-risk act.

Third. Request that Congress be urged to grant authority to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to establish 14 regional offices, and to urge upon all Government agencies having to do with discharged ex-service men the necessity for having all of their offices under one roof.

Fourth. Recommend to Congress the enactment of legislation making sufficient appropriation to provide adequate hospital and sanitarium facilities for the care and treatment of all persons discharged from the military and naval service of the United States, and to provide medical and surgical treatment to any of the persons mentioned above, irrespective of the service origin or aggravation of their disability for one year subsequent to the passage of the act, this in addition to the medical and surgical treatment now provided by law.

Fifth. Request that all disabled ex-service men and women of the military and naval service of the United States be permitted to go to the best hospitals, that they may be treated by their own physicians if they so desire.

Sixth. Recommend that the following bill or some similar bill looking to the reimbursement by the Government of all disabled ex-service men and women for the loans which they necessarily obtain from the Red Cross and other welfare organizations for their support while waiting for their assignment for vocational training or education.

RESOLUTION FOR AN ACT OF CONGRESS TO PROVIDE FOR DISABLED EX-SERVICE MEN AND WOMEN BETWEEN THE TIME OF DISCHARGE AND ENTRANCE UPON TRAINING.

Whereas the immensity of this task, the large number of individuals to be provided for, the detail and consideration of manifold problems involved in the proper performance thereof renders it physically impossible to consummate the duties imposed by statute and a high devotion to the disabled ex-service men and women at a rate of speed sufficient to provide a compensation or rehabilitation for them without unavoidable delays and an interval between the time of discharge and the time of receipt of first pay check for a course of training for rehabilitation; and

Whereas this has necessitated and will necessitate for some time to come the borrowing of money from private or semipublic cooperating organizations or becoming dependent on family or other relatives for such period as is necessitated for the care of and provision for those entitled by priority of discharge to the prior services of the several governmental agencies: So therefore be it unanimously

Resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled, That it is the duty of Congress to provide, and Congress is hereby respectfully requested and urged to provide by law with the least possible delay, the following:

A special payment of $75 per month to be paid to ex-service men and women disabled by tuberculosis, and a special payment of $50 per month to be paid to other disabled ex-service men and women of the United States Army and Navy who served during the period specified in the war-risk insurance act and the vocational rehabilitation act, and who have been or may be discharged from the United States military or naval hospitals with an honorable discharge showing a disability, or who shall develop a disability traceable to their service and apply for compensation within three months.

Said bonus of $75 and $50 per month, respectively, is to be automatically due from date of discharge and shall be paid by the War Department or Navy Department out of special funds which Congress is asked to appropriate for that purpose, and shall be paid continuously from time of discharge until award of compensation or entrance upon a course of training for rehabilitation.

Provided, however, That when an award of compensation shall have been made, as provided in H. R. 8778, commonly known as the Sweet bill, the sums so paid shall be deducted from the amount of arrears of compensation awarded, unless the compensation awarded be less than the sum so paid, in which case no refund shall be required of the amount in excess of said arrears of compensation awarded: And provided further, That if no award of compensation be made before the disabled ex-service men and women enter upon a course of training only such sum of arrears of compensation shall be paid to said ex-service men and women as such award may be in excess of the bonus paid for the period between discharge and entrance upon his course of training.

Seventh. Recommend that the American Legion continue its cooperation with the Federal Board for Vocational Education, Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and Public Health Service in informing and educating all members of the legion, and other ex-service men and women in their rights under the provisions of the various acts administered by said agencies, thereby dispelling, so far as possible, any bad impressions that may have resulted from unwarranted newspaper criticisms.

Eighth. Recommend that the provisions of section 3 of the vocational rehabilitation act be extended so as to include all disabled persons.

Ninth. That paragraph 2, section 2, of Senate resolution No. 4557, the vocational rehabilitation act, as amended by Senate resolution No. 1213, approved July 11, 1919, be amended to read as follows:

"The board shall have the power, and it shall be its duty, to furnish the persons included in this section suitable courses of vocational rehabilitation, to be prescribed and provided by the board; and every person electing to follow such a course of vocational rehabilitation shall, while following the same, be paid monthly by the said board, from the appropriation hereinafter provided, such sum as in the judgment of the said board is necessary for his maintenance and support of persons depending upon him, if any: Provided, however, That in no event shall the sum so paid such person while pursuing such course be less than $100 per month for a single man without dependents, for a man with dependents $120 per month, plus the several sums prescribed as family allowances under section 204 of article 2 of the war-risk insurance act.

"Be it further provided, That we recommend the enactment of legislation which will permit or enable the Federal Board for Vocational Education to pay the necessary traveling expenses of an applicant and his dependents while he may be performing necessary travel in connection with his course of training, and while traveling under orders of the said Federal board."

Tenth. That a resolution regarding equality of disability pay to all officers and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, where the disability was occasioned incident to service in the war with the central powers of Europe, be enacted, to wit:

Whereas the officers and enlisted personnel entering the Army from civil life during the recent war bore the same risks, the same responsibilities and burdens under identical conditions with officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army; and

Whereas National Guard, National Army, and Reserve Corps officers have been discharged on disabilities ranging from 10 per cent to total, which means that they receive after discharge only from $3 to $30 per month, while a Regular Army officer, if he is unfit for active duty, is retired on three-fourths of his pay with additional amounts for commutation of heat, light, and quarters; and

Whereas the present laws and regulations constitute an unjust discrimination in favor of a certain class of our military forces, viz, the Regular Army, and this discrimination being in principle un-American and unworthy the practice of a great democracy: Be it

Resolved by this national convention of the American Legion, That the existing laws and regulations do unjustly and unwisely discriminate in favor of persons whose interests were no greater and whose service was of no greater benefit to the Nation, and that such discrimination has a tendency to place the several branches of our military system on a different status, thereby causing friction and injustice; and be it further

Resolved, That this national convention of the American Legion heartily indorses the resolution on this subject adopted by the St. Louis caucus of the legion, and we again request the Congress of the United States to amend the present laws so as to place all disabled officers and enlisted personnel on the same basis as to retirement for their disability, whether they happened to serve in the Regular Army, the National Guard, the National Army, or the Reserve Corps.

Eleventh. That it is the opinion of the American Legion that in the administration of the compensation features of the war-risk insurance act that the greatest liberality be shown in determining the ratings, and that in case of question as to the rights to compensation or as to the amount of compensation the disabled person be given the benefit of any doubt that may arise.

Twelfth. That legislation be enacted providing that any person who has been eligible and who has received the benefits of the war-risk or vocational-rehabilitation acts or any other act for the relief of disabled service men or women shall suffer the recurrence of the disease or other disability resulting from military or naval service such persons shall again become automatically eligible to all the provisions of such acts without the formalities now required, to the end that speedy relief may be extended to such person, and that all tubercular persons shall be considered totally and permanently disabled while undergoing treatment.

Thirteenth. That the following legislation affecting former service persons securing educational courses be enacted, such legislation known as the Kahn resolution (H. J. Res. 78):

"That in the interpretation and execution of section 42 of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, and section 50 of said act, as amended by joint resolution of Congress of September 8, 1916, credit shall be given as for service in the junior or senior division of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps to any member of those divisions for any period or periods of training during which such members shall have been in active service in the Army of the United States or shall have received intensive training under the supervision of the War Department or shall have pursued a course of military training in any organization authorized by any law of the United States, the amount of such credit to be determined by regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War."

Fourteenth. That the national legislative committee of the American Legion be empowered and directed to investigate all complaints of irregularities and injustices suffered by disabled service men and women in the administration of the war-risk, vocational-rehabilitation, and other beneficial acts and to urge legislation to remedy the same in so far as such legislation may not be covered in this report and is not inconsistent with anything herein contained.

LAND-DEVELOPMENT AND HOME-AID LEGISLATION.

Fifteenth.

Whereas the American Legion, in national convention assembled, has before it a number of bills purporting to be of benefit to those persons who served honorably in the military and naval forces of the United States; and

Whereas none of the proposed bills make adequate provision for the needs of the proposed beneficiaries; and

Whereas delay would be most disastrous: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we request the immediate enactment of a law, to be known as the American Legion home-founding act, embodying the following features:

1. Reclamation of unproductive lands by direct Government operation for settlement by service men and women.

2. Reclamation and development of rural communities by loans of Government credit for settlement of such communities by service men and women.

3. Direct loans to service men and women for the purchase and development of farms.

4. Direct loans to service men and women for the purchase of city homes; and be it further

Resolved:

1. That the administration of the same be decentralized.

2. That no heavy financial restriction be imposed.

3. That the right of eminent domain be incorporated to prevent speculation.

4. That the provision of such act shall be administered by former service men and women; and be it further

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the national executive committee to be known as the committee on land and home aid to secure this needed legislation.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION.

Sixteenth.

Whereas the question of adjustment of compensation or extra pay for service men and women is now pending before the Congress, and before acting thereon the Congress has shown the disposition to await the view of this convention upon the subject: Therefore be it

Resolved, That while the American Legion was not founded for the purpose of promoting legislation in its selfish interest, yet it recognizes that our Government has an obligation to all service men and women to relieve the financial disadvantages incidental to their military service—an obligation second only to that of caring for the disabled and for the widows and orphans of those who sacrificed their lives and one already acknowledged by our allies—but the American Legion feels that it can not ask for legislation in its selfish interest, and leaves with confidence to the Congress the discharge of this obligation.

Seventeenth. The committee desires to record its thanks to the disabled service men and the representatives of various organizations who have given the committee the benefit of their advice and information upon the subjects before it.

LUKE LEA, Chairman.
CUMMINS, Secretary.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY POLICY.

Your committee on military policy met at the Minneapolis Club at 3.30 p. m. Monday, November 10, 1919, and chose as its chairman Mr. L. V. Patch, of Idaho, and as its secretary Mr. B. W. Eddy, of Louisiana.

It was agreed to confine the committee's thought and action to statements of policy rather than statements of detail. The following resolutions were adopted:

1. That a large standing army is uneconomic and un-American. National safety with freedom from militarism is best assured by a national citizen army and navy based on the democratic and American principles of the equality of obligation and opportunity for all.

2. We favor a policy of universal military training, and that the administration of such policy shall be removed from the complete control of any exclusively military organization or caste.

3. We are strongly opposed to compulsory military service in time of peace.

4. We have had a bitter experience in the cost of unpreparedness for national defense and the lack of proper training on the part of officers and men, and we realize the necessity of an immediate revision of our military and naval system and a thorough house cleaning of the inefficient officers and methods of our entire Military Establishment.

We favor a national military and naval system based on universal military obligation, to include a relatively small Regular Army and Navy, and a citizen army and navy capable of rapid expansion sufficient to meet any national emergency, on a plan which will provide competitive and progressive training for all officers, both of the Regular Army and Navy and of the citizen forces.

We believe that such military system should be subject to civil authority.

Any legislation tending toward an enlarged and stronger military and naval caste we unqualifiedly condemn.

5. The national citizen army, which should and must be the chief reliance of this country in time of war, should be officered by men from its own ranks and administered by a general staff on which citizen soldier officers and Regular Army officers shall serve in equal number.

We recommend that military training in high schools and colleges be encouraged.

6. We favor the continuance of training camps for the training and education of officers to serve in case of national requirement.

We recommend that Congress pass such legislation as will make the United States Air Service a separate and distinct department of our system of national defenses under control of a member of the President's Cabinet appointed for that purpose alone.

7. The national citizen army and navy should be organized into corps, divisions, and smaller units composed in each case of officers and men who come from the same State or locality and preserving local designations as far as practicable.

8. The national citizen army and navy should be trained, equipped, officered, and assigned to definite units, before rather than after the commencement of hostilities.

9. The selection and training of men for the national citizen army and navy should be under the local control and administration of its own officers, subject to general national regulations.

10. That a committee of seven be appointed by the executive committee of the American Legion to consult with and advise the Military and Naval Committees of both Houses of Congress as to the working out of the details of organization and training of the future Army and Navy of the United States, using as its basis the resolutions accepted and adopted by this convention.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ADMISSION OF ALIENS TO AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP BY COMMITTEE ON ANTI-AMERICAN PROPAGANDA.

I.

The American Legion believes that the privilege of American citizenship should be granted solely upon the basis of fitness for that status, such fitness to include adaptability to American ideals, social and political, American civilization, form of Government, and standard of living. Therefore be it

Resolved, by the American Legion, in convention assembled, That we urge upon Congress a revision of the immigration policy of the United States based upon the revelations of the war as to the adaptability of alien races for American citizenship, and particularly in view of the fact that a policy of peaceful penetration is being carried on by alien races in certain sections of the United States.

Upholding the right of this Nation to determine its own citizenship without any alien race having cause for grievance over its exclusion from unrestricted immigration, the American Legion calls the especial attention of Congress to the conditions regarding alien penetration prevailing on the Pacific slope, in the Territory of Hawaii, and the Philippine Islands.

To meet these conditions:

1. The American Legion demands immediate action for the abrogation of the so-called "gentlemen's agreement" with Japan, now being continually violated, especially by the admission of the so-called "picture brides," and the exclusion of Japanese from the United States on the same principle already adopted in the case of other oriental races.

2. The American Legion demands confirmation and legalization of the policy that foreign-born Japanese shall be forever barred from American citizenship.

3. The American Legion demands that Congress propose an amendment to section 1 of Amendment XIV of the Federal Constitution that no child born in the United States after the date such amendment becomes effective, of foreign parentage, shall be eligible to citizenship of the United States unless both parents were so eligible at that time.

4. The American Legion requests Congress to send subcommittees of the committees on immigration of both Houses to the Pacific slope, the Territory of Hawaii, and the Philippine Islands in order that they may study conditions and be able to intelligently report legislation along the lines named.

A RESOLUTION FORMING A COMMISSION OF THE AMERICAN LEGION TO FOSTER AND PERPETUATE A 100 PER CENT AMERICANISM.

II.

We recommend the establishment of a national Americanism commission of the American Legion, whose duty shall be the endeavor to realize in the United States the basic ideal of this legion of 100 per cent Americanism through the planning, establishment, and conduct of a continuous, constructive educational system designed to (1) combat all anti-American tendencies, activities, and propaganda; (2) work for the education of immigrants, prospective American citizens and alien residents in the principles of Americanism; (3) inculcate the ideals of Americanism in the citizen population, particularly the basic American principle that the interests of all the people are above those of any special interest or any so-called class or section of the people; (4) spread throughout the people of the Nation information as to the real nature and principles of American government; (5) foster the teaching of Americanism in all schools.

For the purpose stated the commission shall submit to the national executive committee a plan, and from time to time supplementary plans, which may include a national advertising campaign, the publication of literature, the organization of lecture courses, cooperation with schools and other agencies, and such other means of carrying out the purpose outlined as may be appropriate.

Upon approval by the national executive committee the commission shall proceed upon the approved activities.

But no funds shall be used for this purpose except those specifically appropriated by the legion or its properly constituted authorities for the appropriation of funds, or which shall be raised with the approval of the national executive committee from members of the legion only.

The commission may recommend a system of cooperating committees or officers in State branches or posts.

The commission shall be elected by the national executive committee immediately after this convention and shall consist of not over 15 members, who shall hold office for one year, or until the next national convention. It may be authorized by the national executive committee to employ such officers or staff as shall be approved by that committee.

That, as the preliminary organization and planning of the commission will take time, that meanwhile the local posts of the American Legion be urged to organize immediately for the purpose of meeting the insidious propaganda of bolshevism, I. W. W.ism, radicalism, and all other anti-Americanisms by taking up the problems of—

1. Detecting anti-American activities everywhere and seizing every opportunity everywhere to speak plainly and openly for 100 per cent Americanism, and for nothing less.

2. Making direct appeals to legal authority to take such lawful steps as may be necessary to correct local conditions everywhere.

3. Making every member of each local post a constructive force for the upbuilding of a vital knowledge of the principles of the Constitution of the United States and of the processes of law and order obtaining under that Constitution.

4. Showing to every person contaminated by un-American prejudice that the welfare of all the people is really the best interest of any class and that government must be conceived in terms of all the people and not for the benefit of relatively small classes.

Whereas one of the primary purposes of the American Legion is to disseminate the principles of true Americanism and to that end to advise and encourage everything that will tend to secure a positive nationalism and a love and respect of flag and country: Be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of this organization now assembled in convention and legislation to that effect is recommended, that every public and private school in the United States be required to devote at least 10 minutes of each school day to patriotic exercises and that the American flag be kept raised over every such school during every school day, weather permitting; and that the American flag be displayed at all political meetings and public gatherings.

III.

Whereas the Territory of Hawaii is a vital outpost of American civilization in the Pacific; and

Whereas the citizens of that Territory have always been pioneers in the furthering of the ideals of civilization upon which the American Government is founded and have more than met every call in men, service, and money made upon them in the defense of Americanism and civilization; and

Whereas they are now carrying the almost staggering burden of Americanizing a population of which a great proportion is alien; and

Whereas the American Legion of Hawaii is dedicating its energies, with other agencies, to this task: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled, That the legion pledges itself to give all possible aid to the Hawaii branch in this work;

And that the Congress of the United States is urged to extend every assistance possible to the citizens of Hawaii in meeting this Americanization problem by educational and other means and by the encouragement of the settlement in Hawaii of Americans or of peoples whose loyalty to the United States and whose assimilability in an American community is certain.

IV.

Resolved, That we, the American Legion in convention assembled, demand that the Government of the United States proceed forthwith and immediately to deport all aliens who have already been tried, convicted, or interned as enemies of our Government, and that all other aliens who are advocating the overthrow of our Government by force and violence be tried, and, if possible, convicted and deported; that in the event the present laws of the United States are not sufficient to cover this situation, that Congress pass such laws as will enable our law-enforcing officials to rid our country of this scum who hate our God, our country, our flag, and who prate of their privileges and refuse to perform their duties; be it further

Resolved, That Congress pass such laws which will effectually punish Americans who have become so lost to common decency and patriotism that they are actually assisting aliens to bring about disorder and revolution in our country, and if such Americans be naturalized citizens that their citizenship be revoked and they be deported; be it further

Resolved, That we recommend a course in citizenship constitute a part of the curriculum of every school in this country and that all our schools be thrown open to aliens for night courses, and all other persons who care to take advantage of same.

The spirit of this resolution is the Americanization of America, and we feel if the above demands and recommendations are followed the next generation will see this country rid of the undesirable element now present in its citizenship, foreign colonies a thing of the past, the spirit of true Americanism prevailing throughout the length and breadth of our country, and our ideals of Government secure.

V.

Whereas there exists in this country at the present time various organizations and isms whose ultimate aim is the destruction of the principles of law, order, and true democracy; and

Whereas these organizations are all known and closely watched by the Department of Justice, and it is said that this department has at the present time in their possession a great mass of facts and evidence regarding these activities, especially those of the so-called parlor socialist and Bolsheviki, which our organization considers by far the most dangerous, for they, under a mask of respectability, insidiously inject infamous teachings into the minds and thoughts of our citizens: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President of these United States is respectfully petitioned to take such steps as are necessary to change the Department of Justice from a passive evidence-collecting organization to a militant and active group of workers, whose findings shall be forcefully acted upon by this, our American Government.

Submitted by

R. C. SAUER, Wisconsin.

ENFORCEMENT OF SENTENCES OF PERSONS CONVICTED OF VIOLATIONS OF THIS DRAFT LAW AND OTHER LAWS RELATING TO THE MILITARY AND NAVAL PREPARATION OF THE UNITED STATES.

VI.

Whereas there has been an appeal of considerable strength brought to bear upon the authorities of this country by a seditious element, which is prejudicial to the best interests of true Americanism and of our established customs and institutions, that certain prisoners of a political character be released; and

Whereas these prisoners strove to defeat the draft law, the mobilization of American forces, the successful prosecution of the war, and other measures contributing to our national defense: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Legion, in annual convention assembled, does hereby urge upon Congress that adequate measures be taken to prevent the release of this class of prisoners from confinement, that there be no mitigation of their sentences, that where possible they be deported upon expiration of their sentences, and that most stringent steps be taken in every dealing with them to show to this and future generations that there is no home in America for sedition, and that the United States is a land of honor that can brook neither treachery nor traitors.

PROVIDING FOR THE DEPORTATION OF THE ALIEN SLACKER.

VII.

Whereas during the period of the participation by the United States in the Great War many aliens who had already taken steps to become United States citizens experienced a change of heart and renounced their intention of becoming citizens; and

Whereas this action on the part of said aliens proves that they had no sincere intention in the first instance of becoming citizens, and in their application for their first papers were guided by improper motives, and were guilty of imposition and fraud upon our naturalization laws: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the American Legion in national convention assembled, That we demand of Congress the passage of laws providing for the deportation of aliens guilty of the fraud and imposition aforesaid to the countries of their origin.

PROVIDING FOR PUBLISHING NAMES OF ALIEN SLACKERS.

VIII.

Whereas during the period of the participation by the United States in the Great War many aliens who had already taken steps to become citizens of the United States experienced a change of heart and renounced their intention of becoming citizens and expressed a desire to remain citizens or subjects of the lands of their origin; and

Whereas it is vital to our welfare that these men who deserted the country which gave them refuge in their hour of need should never again have the opportunity of imposing upon our naturalization laws by expressing intentions which they have no sincere purpose to fulfill: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the American Legion in national convention assembled, That we demand of Congress the passage of laws requiring the Bureau of Naturalization to compile a list of such aliens, giving their names and addresses, to print a sufficient number of such lists, to file a copy of such lists as a public court record in every court in the United States authorized by law to grant naturalization, and requiring every such alien, under suitable penalties, to notify the Bureau of Naturalization and the court of the county in which he resides of every change in his place of residence, which change the bureau shall transmit to all courts in the United States aforesaid for their information and guidance in preventing imposition.

LEGISLATION DEMANDED TO PREVENT ALIENS WHO WERE EXEMPTED FROM MILITARY SERVICE FROM BECOMING CITIZENS.

IX.

Whereas during the period of the participation by the United States in the Great War, many aliens resident among us claimed and were granted exemption from the selective-service law on the ground of alienage; and

Whereas these aliens thereby sought and did obtain the benefits of our laws and institutions while renouncing any obligation to defend the same, thereby proving themselves undesirable and unworthy to become citizens of the country for which we fought and for which our comrades gave their lives: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we demand of the Congress the passage of laws which shall effectively and forever make it impossible for these aliens to acquire citizenship; and further be it

Resolved, That we demand of Congress the passage of laws requiring the Bureau of Naturalization to compile a list of said aliens with the assistance of the War Department, that said list be published and that a copy thereof be deposited as a public document with the clerk of every United States court in this country.

A RESOLUTION DEMANDING THAT THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES ADOPT ADEQUATE LEGISLATION TO PREVENT ANY ALIENS OR ORGANIZATION TO CARRY ON PROPAGANDA INIMICAL TO THE INTERESTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

X.

Whereas there are in the United States a large number of men and women who are endeavoring to overthrow the Government of the United States by illegal means or by force; and

Whereas there is apparently not now in the statutes of the United States, adequate legislation to prevent any person, organization, association, or society, foreign or domestic, from carrying on meetings and issuing printed and verbal propaganda, inimical to the interests of the United States and organized government: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Legion in national convention assembled, That Congress take immediate action to enact legislation to prevent any person or persons, organizations or societies within the United States from carrying on any verbal, written or printed intercourse, or correspondence with any other person or persons either citizens or aliens with the intent either peaceably or by violence to overthrow the Government of the United States; be it further

Resolved, That the American Legion urges upon Congress the necessity for severe penalities for violation of any act or acts which may be enacted in connection with these matters; and that aliens found guilty of violation of any act or acts of this character may be summarily deported after sentence expires.

RESOLUTION ON EDUCATION.

XI.

Whereas it is the belief of the American Legion that a speaking and reading knowledge of the American language is essential to the proper conception of the principles of our Government and of American institutions, and that much of the dangerous radicalism now existent in this country has originated and is fostered by persons of our non-American speaking population: It is

Resolved, 1. That all the youth of this country should have an elementary education in the fundamentals necessary for citizenship and particularly in the language of the United States and that Congress be requested, during the present session, to pass such acts as will require the basis of all instruction in elementary public and private schools to be the American language.

2. That the Congress of the United States be urged to enact such laws as will require aliens resident in this country to acquire a knowledge of the American language.

RESOLUTION REGARDING THE ANTI-AMERICAN PROPAGANDA AIDED AND ABETTED BY ACTIONS OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT IN ITS HANDLING OF CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS.

XII.

Whereas the War Department, ignoring the resolutions passed by the national caucus of the American Legion, has permitted conscientious objectors who had been legally tried and convicted for disobedience of all orders and of treachery by a court of competent jurisdiction to be pardoned, restored to duty, and honorably discharged, with all back pay and allowance and a new outfit; and

Whereas this conduct on the part of the War Department not only has brought shame and discredit to the men who fought to protect this Government but has served to aid and abet and encourage the marked growth of anti-American propaganda from radicals, Bolshevists, and anarchists, who are the avowed enemies of our Government; and

Whereas the members of the War Department, though manifesting great diligence in punishing the defenders of our country for the slightest infraction of military discipline, yet persist in showing such anxiety for the safety and welfare of conscientious objectors, many of whom were naught but enemies of this country hiding behind the cloak of religion: Be it therefore

Resolved, That we, the American Legion, in national convention assembled, do hereby request that Congress shall speedily and thoroughly investigate the release and the aforesaid conscientious objectors and direct the War Department to recall honorable discharges granted this class of men; and be it further

Resolved, That we demand that Congress shall at once enact such laws as may be necessary to prevent ever again enemies of this country hiding behind a religious cloak to be honored by this country when deserving nothing but disgrace; and be it further

Resolved, That we request of Congress the enactment at once of such laws as may be necessary to promptly punish the conscientious objectors of the past World War who are American citizens, and speedily deport from this country conscientious objectors who are aliens, and that the officials of the War Department responsible for such tender treatment accorded the conscientious objectors be summarily dealt with, be those officials high or low; and be it further

Resolved, That we hereby announce to the world that the American Legion considers the action of the War Department in this matter as one of the first counts in spreading and encouraging anti-American propaganda.

RESOLUTION IN OPPOSITION TO THE PROMISCUOUS ORGANIZATION OF SOCIETIES OSTENSIBLY FOR THE RELIEF OF THE CIVIL POPULATION OF ENEMY COUNTRIES.

XIII.

Whereas the American Legion views with apprehension the tendency of enemy sympathizers to organize societies ostensibly for the purpose of affording relief to the civilian population of enemy countries: It is therefore

Resolved, That such relief as may be furnished to the civilian population of countries now or lately our enemies be extended solely through the media of agencies incorporated by the Congress of the United States or through agencies incorporated by the Congress of the United States or through agencies authorized for such purpose by Congress.

XIV.

Whereas certain publications in foreign languages published or distributed in the United States are used by anarchists and revolutionists to preach destruction of American institutions and the Government of the United States: Be it

Resolved, That it is the consensus of opinion of the American Legion in convention assembled that all foreign language newspapers, magazines, periodicals, and pamphlets published or distributed in the United States be required to furnish a true and correct translation, properly sworn to, of all articles, together with the true name and correct address of the author of every article so published which tend to condemn our form of government and which are of a political nature, and that five copies of said translation be left with the postmaster in the place of publication, and if published abroad with the Postmaster General of the United States, such copies to be open to public inspection, and that suitable penalties be provided by law for violation of the requirement.

Amended, that the translation of any such article be published in parallel column under oath as to its accuracy, with severe penalty. (Passed as amended.)

JOHN J. SULLIVAN,
Chairman of Anti-American Propaganda.

This is the earnest appeal of your patriotic sons to all Americans who truly represent the American spirit and seek universal happiness and prosperity. We represent potentially 4,800,000 men who were in the service in this Great War, therefore this is no light resolution, but a first appeal of great hearts for fair and square dealing on the part of all concerned. If they do not act fairly, squarely, and sensibly, the same spirit that led us to take up the fight for righteousness and humanity on the battle field will lead us to exercise all the powers within us to solve the situation and to save our country.

XXV.

(1) Whereas the present widespread disorder among our large alien population is largely the result of seditious conduct of paid and skilled alien agitators, unmindful of the hospitality of the country in which they are temporarily sojourning: Therefore be it

XXIX.

Resolved, That the American Legion urges immediate revision of the Articles of War and court-martial laws of the United States.

XXX.

(1) Whereas anarchistic and un-American groups in the United States have incited riots and disorder in many of our communities and have already wantonly murdered our comrades and fellow citizens: Be it

(2) Resolved, That the American Legion, fully recognizing its obligation to the community, State, and Nation, urges its members as individual citizens to promptly, fearlessly, and effectively assist the constituted legal authorities in the maintenance of law and order and the suppression of riots and mob violence.

JOHN W. INZER, of Tennessee, Chairman.
MARK T. MCKEE, of Michigan,
Secretary.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM B. McKINLEY,
OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, December 16, 1919.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, the history of the sugar legislation is as follows: War was declared April 6, 1917. There was a great shortage of food in Europe. The Allies begged the United States to supply them with sugar, wheat, and fats. Congress passed the food-control act August 10, 1917. Under that act and the war powers the President has absolute control of the manufacture, sale, distribution, and price of sugar. In order to provide suitable machinery to buy and sell sugar a corporation was organized under the laws of New Jersey, for which the United States provided $5,000,000 cash capital. The stock was all subscribed for in the name of the President of the United States, and he appointed eight directors, called the Sugar Equalization Board. Since that time this board has told the American people how much sugar they can use and the price they must pay. The United States is the largest sugar consumer in the world, eating about 90 pounds per person per year, or a total of about 5,000,000 tons. The total sugar production of the world per year is about 17,000,000 tons. Cuba produces four and one-half million tons and only consumes one-thirtieth what she raises. She has four and one-third million tons to sell to other countries. The United States and her possessions—Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippine Islands—produce nearly 2,000,000 tons, leaving about 3,000,000 to buy outside. Cuba is only 80 miles from the United States, with four and one-third million tons of sugar to sell. The Sugar Board, under control of the President, has had since August, 1917, full power to buy. They bought all of last year's crop from the Cuban Planters' Association under an agreement to resell one-third of it to our allies.

In July of this year this same Cuban Planters' Association offered to sell again to the United States at a price of about 6¼ cents per pound. Early last August seven of the eight members of the Sugar Board asked the President to give them authority to accept this offer in order that the people of the United States might have sufficient sugar. The President did not act, possibly because his mind was taken up with matters which he considered more important.

In September the board again asked the President to give them the authority to buy. Still no action; and on September 22 the Cubans withdrew their offer and began to sell abroad.

There is still a considerable portion of the Cuban crop unsold. Some will be ready for the market by January next; and, while it is not considered that this legislation is legally necessary, nevertheless, as the gentleman from Michigan has so clearly stated, it is thought best to pass this bill in order to encourage the President to buy sufficient sugar so that the people will not suffer, even if he does have to pay twice as much per pound in January as he would have had to pay last August.

Many Members feel, as I do, that the way to resume is to resume; that the way to get back to normal business ways is to just go back and drop these war powers and Government interference with private business. But the difficulty is that so long as the President retains these powers, and may interfere at any time, the private business men are afraid to buy this Cuban sugar in large quantities for fear that they may get many millions of dollars worth on hand and then the Government step in and order them to sell at a great loss.

The committee hearings on this bill brought out the fact that this present administration required the producers of Michigan, Colorado, and Nebraska to sell their sugar crop at 10 cents a pound and permitted the Louisiana producers to market their crop at 17 cents a pound. Under the present rulings of the board the country is cut into zones, and you can only buy sugar in that zone in which you live. This bill repeals that order and gives the dealer the right to buy where he can get it cheapest.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WHITMELL P. MARTIN,
OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, December 19, 1919.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me by the House to revise and extend my remarks on the McNary sugar bill, which was railroaded through the House on last Tuesday, I wish to now most emphatically protest that this bill did not receive the consideration to which it was entitled.

To begin with, the bill was not voted on in the House Committee on Agriculture until after 11 o'clock on Tuesday, and at 4 o'clock on the same day it was called up in the House for consideration under a suspension of the rules. The bill was never printed, but was presented to the House in typewritten form, and thus the Members of the House had no opportunity to read the bill or to hear it read until it was suddenly called up for consideration.

Furthermore, there was no opportunity to amend the bill, because when the rules are suspended no motion to amend is in order and the bill must be passed as reported or not at all.

The time allotted for debate under the rules is only 40 minutes, and while by unanimous consent this time was extended for 40 additional minutes, yet the time was controlled by two gentlemen from the committee which reported the bill, both of whom favored the bill.

True it is that 18 minutes of this time was allotted to me, but the balance of the 80 minutes was given to Members who favored the bill just as it was written and presented to the House.

But this is not all; there were many Members on the floor who were most anxious to understand the provisions of this bill before they were called on to vote upon it, and to this end they were asking me questions when the Speaker's gavel reminded me that my time had expired. I was prepared to answer any and all questions that would throw any light on the subject, as the sugar producers have nothing to conceal, and full, free, and fair debate would have disclosed the fact that this legislation is not only iniquitous and unnecessary but sets a precedent that will yet return to haunt those who so insistently clamored for the passage of this bill.

During the course of the debate I asked the gentleman from Mississippi this question:

Mr. MARTIN. Would the gentleman favor an equalization board for the purpose of holding down the price and distribution of the cotton crop?

Mr. CANDLER. When an emergency exists as it is here, it will be time enough to consider that question; but it does not exist now and it has not existed in the past. The farmers are not getting full value for their cotton now. There is a world shortage of cotton and a small crop in this country, of course, has advanced the price.

There is a world shortage of sugar and, like cotton, this is the cause of the advance in the price of sugar, and the same reason which the gentleman from Mississippi assigns for the control of sugar exists as to cotton.

But I am much more charitably inclined toward cotton than the gentleman is toward sugar.

The cotton planter, like the sugar planter, has a short crop this year, and I am glad to see him receive a price that will save him from loss, and I shall never cast my vote to subject the cotton planter to the hardship which must necessarily follow control and license.

Bill (H. R. 9755) to Establish Standard of Weights and Measures.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARVILLE D. BENSON,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, December 8, 1919.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to vote for this bill, and would do so if certain amendments had been passed that would bring it under the interstate-commerce law; but being thoroughly convinced that there is no fixing of the standard either of weights or measures under this bill and that the passage of the bill as written, under the pretense that it is designed to fix a standard of weights and measures, will bring about litigation which will possibly be carried to the Supreme Court, and when it goes there that it will be declared unconstitutional, and believing that such a law would simply tend to interfere with business, put additional burdens on the people, and waste the time of the courts, I shall vote against the bill.

I believe it would interfere largely with the small millers throughout the United States, where there is no occasion or necessity for having packages that are stamped with a certain amount of weight on them, because those millers grind for the local trade, grind by the pound, and the farmers who buy of them have intelligence enough to know what 25 pounds or 50 pounds are.

If the amendment suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] had been passed it would have put this bill under the interstate-commerce law, where I believe it belongs, and where it would not interfere with small millers serving their local trade. It will in its present form, I believe, be unconstitutional, and its passage will be an unnecessary and annoying attempt to burden the small millers throughout the country. There is not sufficient value in it to justify the inconvenience it will cause.

I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Deportation of Anarchist Aliens.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM N. VAILE,

OF COLORADO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Saturday, December 20, 1919.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me to extend the remarks spoken by me December 20, when the House was considering H. R. 11224, I have thought it might be of interest to the House if I should publish the story of the actual deportation of the first large group of anarchists, including Alexander Berkman and Emma Goldman.

As there were no newspaper men present, this story of the deportation of these people to their beloved soviet Russia may possess some historical interest as the version of an eyewitness of that departure.

The night was clear and starry and rather cold, though the air did not have a real cutting edge and there was no wind to sharpen it.

At midnight at the barge office there were a good many people, mostly men. Mr. Hoover, that slender bundle of high-charged electric wire, the prosecutor of the Department of Justice, told us that these were mostly agents of his department, brought here for this particular job. There were perhaps 30 of them at the barge office waiting for the boat that was to take them on the first stage, the 18-minute stage, of their 18-day journey across the Atlantic and through the Baltic. The others were people who worked and lived at Ellis Island, who had been spending the evening in town and were availing themselves of the unusual opportunity of a late boat back.

That boat shortly drew up at the pier and was seen to be transformed by the snow and frost from the dingy, grimy, little tug of a month ago into a beautiful dream boat. Viewed thus, she might have represented, according to the mood or the age of the observer, a fairy ship from a child's picture book, or the frosted cake of a bride's confection. To me she seemed more emblematic of the cold, sharp cleanliness of the undertaking on which we were engaged and suggested the spotless apron of the surgeon.

A keen-eyed special agent of the Department of Justice and an immigration inspector looked sharply at each of us as we boarded. There were to be "none but Americans on guard" this night.

Just as the boat had suggested the surgeon's apron, so Ellis Island, white in the moonlight with her light covering of fresh snow, suggested the operating table. A little later we inspected the cancerous growth about to be cut out of the American body politic.

Two hundred and forty-six anarchists were gathered in the great wardroom. Alexander Berkman, the obvious leader, dressed as for a sporting trip, in soldier's puttees, a soldier's khaki flannel shirt, a flowing cravat, and a pair of gray breeches of military cut, was writing letters and conferring with his three principal associates—Peter Bianky, president of the Russian Workers' Union, who had attempted to blow up Ohio factories, and Oredowsky and Schnebel, lately officers of the Seattle I. W. W. These were organizers and promoters of the general strike, described by I. W. W. literature as "a social revolution of the world; an entire new organization; a demolition of the entire old system of all governments."

We call this general strike—

to distinguish it from general strikes for higher wages or for political privileges, "The social general strike." * * * It is to completely interrupt production in the whole country and stop communication and consumption for the ruling classes, and that for a time long enough to totally disorganize the capitalistic society, so that after the complete annihilation of the old system, the working people can take possession, through its labor unions, of all the means of production, mines, houses, the land; in short, of all the economic factors. * * * With a free society, without class rule and exploitation, a society of free cooperation, we have that which corresponds with the absence of government—"anarchism."

Most of the 246 seemed to me to have rather stupid faces. I tried to make allowance for the fact that the hour was long after midnight, that the men were tired and naturally anxious and worried, that they were seen under such circumstances as to create the least favorable impression in the beholder. And yet, with the exception of the leaders mentioned and a very few others, the faces did not look to me like those of intellectual men, but like those of degraded and brutalized men.

One exception was a lean-faced, rather crafty faced, young Jew, who told me he had not had a chance to get cashed his last pay check from the silk mills, and that consequently he had been unable to buy tobacco. I gave him a package of cigarettes, for which he very courteously thanked me. This man said that he had a mother and sisters here and that as he had lived in this country for nearly 20 years and had come here in his teens, he did not know anyone in Russia, nor had he, as far as he knew, any relatives there. He did not contend that his mother and sister needed his support. I asked him if he had not considered deportation as among the probable consequences of his conduct before he was arrested. He contended very bitterly that he had done nothing which would justify deportation from a "free country." He believed in "free speech" and "free press," and capitalism had suppressed them. The Government was merely run in the interests of capitalism and should be abolished, by force if necessary.

I might refer here to a popular misunderstanding of the deportation law. Deportation is not a punishment for crime, though certain kinds of criminal aliens may be deported following conviction. Deportation is merely the act of ridding ourselves of foreigners who are not eligible for residence here under our laws and who would be excluded if they were subject to, and were known to be subject to, the disqualification of the law when they first sought admission. It must, I think, be conceded that a nation has the right to refuse its privileges and protection to any class of aliens whom it may consider undesirable residents. For this reason we refuse admission to certain classes who are not criminals but who are deemed detrimental to us for economic or social reasons, as, for instance, illiterates, persons suffering from certain diseases, persons likely to become a public charge, and Chinese. Now, if you are an American citizen, you can not be deprived of the right of residence in the United States, even though you may be illiterate or a public charge. We have many—too many—of both classes, but deportation is not the way in which the country deals with Americans who fall in these categories. And so, if you are an American, you may still advocate the overthrow of the Government by force and violence, and so long as you do not yourself commit an overt act you may do this without yourself being thrown in jail—for a short time only, because there will soon be a law to fit your case. But for reasons which have appeared sufficient to us we have exercised our national prerogative to declare that just as we will not admit aliens who are illiterate or likely to become a public charge or who are suffering from a contagious disease, so we will not admit or keep "aliens who are anarchists, aliens who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States; * * * aliens who are opposed to all organized government; aliens who advocate or teach the assassination of public officials; aliens who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property," and so forth.

And the House of Representatives has amended this by passing a bill prepared by our committee so as to catch aliens who "advise" or who belong to or are affiliated with or contribute money to any organization which advises, advocates, or teaches these things or which publishes or circulates literature which does so.

In other words, the alien who comes here or who stays here must do so on our terms, and it is not a question of whether he actually commits a crime. It is a question of whether he is qualified to be here under our rules. Personally, I think those rules are about the minimum that we can impose for our own protection and safety and that they furnish no ground of complaint whatsoever to a person who comes here because he did not like the conditions in the land which produced him.

One remarkable youth—Bukhanob, I believe his name is—was looking forward to the trip as a great lark. This lad is only 17 years old, but has been a teacher for two years in an anarchist school in New York. He said that he had started in at 10 as a socialist, but had become an anarchist through reading anarchist literature at the New York public libraries. Investigation by reporters disclosed that there was plenty of such to be found there, Kropotkin's "Memoirs of a Revolutionist," for example, being kept there in nine different languages. It was difficult to get a copy of this work because all copies were generally "out." However, the young man told us that he was a nephew of Peter Bianky, so we can hardly lay all blame for his perverted education to the free public fountain of knowledge. He told us he was going to write two books, and when we asked him what he was going to say in the second one he replied, "All that I didn't say in the first."

And there were quite a number of others who were not stupid—one a young giant with flaming red hair. He got another package of cigarettes from me. I had a dozen packs in my pocket. I feel a smoker's sympathy for another smoker who may be without tobacco and had intended to distribute these small offerings of good will to individuals. I had come to the island with a firm determination to be charitable and to distinguish between the individual and his views. I found it impossible to do so. As I listened to the conversation of these men and noticed their bitter sneers I became filled with loathing for them and decided that the rest of my tobacco should go to Americans.

Altogether, try as I might in the interest of fairness, to avoid first-hand impressions, these men seemed, on the average, though with the exceptions noted, to be a very poor lot, both as to physique and mentality. They certainly would compare unfavorably with any equal number of American workingmen.

Berkman went out of the room once, by permission of the guards, to get a package which he had overlooked and on his return the others all arose and remained standing until he had taken his seat, a curious demonstration of the fact that even in an anarchist society there is some authority or leadership which is respected.

Of course, no such personal respect would be paid to individual representatives of the hated "capitalistic" Government of America, though some confidence seemed to be imposed in its stability, notwithstanding the necessity of its immediate overthrow. This was shown by the fact that a great many thousands of dollars of their money was in postal-savings certificates. Altogether they had about $200,000. The major part of it was in cash. Some of it was in uncertified checks of former employers. Of course, to have had Liberty bonds would have been unspeakable and none were discovered. In respect to this large sum of money, they enjoyed a privilege not granted to the rest of us, for no effort was made by the internal-revenue office to collect the tax paid by other people on money taken out of the country.

The complaint as to inability to cash their checks was not well founded, as the immigration authorities had offered to cash such checks for them during the banking hours of the day, and also to procure foreign exchange in drafts on any foreign country having exchange rates with us, but they were unwilling to trust the Government with their checks. Possibly the real reason was that they had intended to place the money in the hands of their associates here for the spread of anarchistic propaganda. There may have been a few instances where they had intended to leave it for the assistance of relatives left behind; but, so far as I know, no cases of dependent relatives were reported to the immigration officials. The Secretary of Labor a day or two before the sailing had canceled the deportation orders of most of those who had wives here. Bianky and perhaps one or two others were exceptions.

Nobody seemed to know what the value of American money was in the rubles of the much-vaunted soviet republic, but all agreed that the purchasing power of the American dollar was not less than nine times as high in Russia as it is here, even in these days of the reign of old King H. C. L. We are told, though I have not yet seen the actual proof of it, that some of these men have recently been selling in New York $1 bonds of "the American soviet republic," payable "one day after the revolution."

Some 70 of the 248 had been detained for some time at Ellis Island and had participated in a hunger strike as a protest against being allowed to see their relatives only through a screen. The screen had been erected on account of one or two attempts to pass weapons. We had seen the men during this hunger strike, and they didn't seem to be suffering much, though they were accumulating plenty of venom. Bianky had told Chairman JOHNSON, of the Immigration Committee, in my presence, that they were going to stop destroying buildings. Hereafter they were going to break heads and use the buildings. "Meaning my head, I suppose," said Chairman JOHNSON. "Yes," replied Bianky, "your head and other heads like it." Possibly some of them may yet reach the conclusion that even heads are worth preserving. I hope so.

As a matter of fact, however, the hunger strike was not real. It only lasted until they had consumed the supply of food which they had cached in preparation for it.

On the night of the departure there were certainly no faces lined with hunger and privation, and during that day and the preceding day they had been rather defiant and had entertained themselves and the Ellis Island force by singing their Internationale and the Red Flag song of the I. W. W.'s.

This night, with some exceptions, they were gloomy and morose.

At 3.30 a. m., of the 21st of December, they were marched out of the building in single file, between two rows of guards, to the gangplank of the tug. A coast guard at the shore end of the gangplank counted them off by tens, making a little pause between each 10. A frank-faced American youth, Lieut. Cunningham, of the Thirteenth Infantry, with an automatic pistol on his hip, stood at one side of the ship end of the gangplank. Opposite him was a soldier of his company with a rifle lying in his elbow. Two other soldiers stood, rifles in hand, on the upper deck of the tug, immediately over the gangplank deck. Nothing was said during the boarding except Lieut. Cunningham's occasional warning to "mind your head" on account of the low-hanging upper deck.

The women came separately—Emma Goldman in a gray and black fur coat reaching below her knees, the two young women, Dora Lipkin and Ethel Bernstein, in heavy woolen coats. They were sent immediately into the kitchen of the tug, which served as their cabin for the two hours' journey out to the transport lying beyond the "Narrows" at Gravesend. A soldier stood at the door of the kitchen, but paid no particular attention to the women, who conversed freely but not eagerly with us. Miss Goldman took off her fur coat and sat with her gray sweater unbuttoned, morose and bitter, occasionally heaving a silent sigh. Dora Lipkin was sad and very quiet. I confess that her pale intellectual face, with her black hair falling in great gulfs over her ears, inspired me with sympathy for her sorrow, for her common-law husband had just been sent to Atlanta to commence a 20-year sentence, and he was doubtless occupying her thoughts. The separation of criminals from their families is one of the sad necessities of civilization, perhaps less sad here than in Russia, where we understand that shortly preceding this deportation some 300 persons, criminal in the sight of the Bolsheviki because they had been stirring up a revolution against the soviets, were permanently parted from their friends by execution.

Ethel Bernstein had a single rose, which she held to her lips occasionally. It was sent to her, she said, by one of her "good friends." Miss Goldman had a few sprigs of holly, which lay beside her Corona typewriter case on the tug's kitchen table. That typewriter case was rather worn from hard usage, but I am sure that the keys are in perfect working order.

All of the deportees were allowed to have their baggage taken on board by the Ellis Island employees, and at least a hundred trunks and large bags were so loaded, including two trunks belonging to Miss Goldman. Many, however, preferred to carry their own baggage, and some carried a trunk on the shoulder and a satchel in the free hand. All wore overcoats, for the Immigration Bureau had provided those who lacked warm clothing with Army mackinaws and with underwear, shoes, and caps. Two large paper cartons of caps were loaded. I noticed these particularly, because one of the packages got broken in the process of transfer from the tug to the transport, and the contents became exposed and had to be handled with some care by the tug crew. These were not the Army caps, but were of the kind worn by farmers and woodsmen, woolen caps with a flap to be turned down over the ears. They were the personal property of one of the deportees, and were possibly intended for free distribution or for sale in Russia.

A dozen or more carried mandolins, guitars, or other musical instruments, and two or three bore large boxes of books.

The little tug was pretty crowded, though the officers told us she had often carried as many as a hundred more than were then aboard. This necessitated some of the passengers remaining on deck for the two hours' trip down the bay and resulted in a curious incident. Just after passing the Liberty Statue the tug met an incoming immigrant vessel. Some of the newly arriving ones were crowding to the rail of the inbound steamship, eager for the first glimpse of the promised land. They cheered us, not knowing who we were, but because we were a small boat of the new country evidently engaged on its local business and, I believe, because the Star Spangled Banner floating over us was just "catching the gleam of the morning's first beam." It was a brave little cheer, just a bit quavery, a sort of timid, inquiring little cheer like the cry of children hoping for a welcome from the grown-ups. The answer was an obscene throaty "yah-ah-ah" from our upper deck, a jeering, raucous, sarcastic, bitter yell, scalding with hatred, spite, and bitter jest, long-drawn out, venomous. As it died away the tug gave a couple of reassuring little friendly toots, and some one from the upper deck—I believe it was one of the Arizona rangers of the border patrol—shouted, "Mornin', folks."

In company with Mr. Hoover, I talked a little with Miss Goldman on the trip across the bay. This, she said, was the beginning of the end of the United States. Time was when this country had professed to welcome the downtrodden of other lands. At that time Russia was deporting men and women to Siberia for their political beliefs. Now it was reversed. A free Russia had arisen. As the old Russia had fallen, so the new United States would fall, and for the same reasons. Oh, yes; she would be back and give us another job, though it would not be an official job. Our days of official authority would be over before her return, early though that would be. Our days of official authority were numbered and the number was getting low.

She was quite bitter against Mr. Hoover because he had not given notice to her counsel, Mr. Weinberger, of the time of the departure. The world knows, of course, that she had had her day in court, and many such days, and that every possible recourse had finally been tried in vain, but apparently she still had some hope that the courts would have protected her. Mr. Hoover asked: "Haven't I given you a square deal, Miss Goldman?" "Oh, I suppose you've given me as square a deal as you could," she answered. "We shouldn't expect from any person something beyond his capacity."

She asked us whether the departments were still "passing the buck to each other," blaming each other for failure to effect her deportation before. It seemed ungenerous to gloat over a fallen foe, and that foe a woman, but I thought it not improper to suggest that whatever disagreement there might have been between different authorities of our Government was due to extreme solicitude that no injustice be done her. "Oh, have it your own way," she answered, and relapsed into morose silence.

Shortly thereafter we were lashed to the Buford, an old Spanish War transport, an excellent and comfortable boat, according to all who have traveled in her; and we of the congressional party, being certain that the country will some day be flooded with horrible stories of the shocking brutalities attendant upon this forced exodus, were very particular to observe the accommodations provided for the unwilling passengers.

The women were to travel substantially first class. There was one large stateroom of four beds provided for the three of them, with a bathroom for their exclusive use. They are to eat in the same cabin as the ship's officers, though, of course, at a separate table.

The men have the same quarters as those used by our soldiers during the Spanish War. These were much more commodious than those of the transports used by our men during the recent war, and on the Buford they are certainly ample. The beds are in double tiers, three high, but the top tier of each set is reserved for baggage. There are 50 or more lavatories, and there are a number of shower baths. The beds are all provided with plenty of warm blankets and with white linen. The anarchists eat in a large dining hall at tables with clean linen, not as our soldiers did, standing, and out of their mess kits.

Our soldiers on the transport—there are 50 picked men from the Thirteenth Infantry—told us that the anarchists' quarters were much better in every way than those which they themselves had had in their recent trips to and from the war zone. They are, in fact, somewhat better than the quarters now used by our guards on this vessel, and the soldiers use their own blankets, without bed linen.

Several days before the Buford was to sail Mr. Caminetti, the Commissioner General of Immigration, discovered that under the arrangements which had been made the food of the anarchists would be considerably better than the food of the soldiers, inasmuch as he had provided on the basis of a dollar a day for subsistence for the former, while the subsistence of the latter was on the Army basis of 60 cents per day. He remedied this inequality, not by cutting down the allowance for the anarchists but by increasing the allowance for the soldiers out of the funds of his department. Incidentally, I may say that I gave the rest of my cigarettes and a pocketful of cigars to the soldiers. I was certainly proud of the appearance of these fine, upstanding lads. It would be impossible to find a better lot.

In addition to the soldiers, there are about an equal number of coast guards and border-patrol men, old, experienced, hawk-eyed chaps, like Milton, of Arizona, and Webb, of California, he with the 10-inch Gatling gun in one hip pocket and the Bible in the other. These chaps are in charge of a certain Mr. Berkshire, a quiet, soft-voiced, firm-handed, gray-eyed man, who has been in charge of immigrant inspection on the Mexican border for the last 12 years. You know as soon as you look at him that he can neither be fooled nor cowed.

At half past 6 in the morning we left the Buford, a black body outlined in red against the rising sun. Some one might say it was the "rising sun of the East," the red fire of bolshevism coming up to welcome her offspring. But that would be a great mistake. The reassurance was ours a few minutes later, for, rising out of the blackness of the night at her feet, there stood our own mother, illuminated by the same glorious rays, the Goddess of Liberty—of precious liberty under the law—bathed from her feet to the tip of her torch in the new light of a cleaner and better day, her calm and noble face looking upon us in the confidence that the Republic shall be kept clean and in its cleanliness shall endure.

The Pension Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, this bill appeals to me. It is in no proper sense an increase of pensions. It barely equalizes the pensions, comparing the purchasing power of the dollar with the purchasing power of the dollar in 1912, at the time the so-called Sherwood dollar-a-day pension act passed Congress. The purchasing power of the dollar to-day is a trifle below 40 cents, and it will never be materially greater as long as our currency is so largely inflated. Money measures value. Every inflation of our currency lessens that much the value of the dollar and increases in the same proportion all property. In 1912 the money circulation per capita was $19.50; now it is over $52. Certain officials are now in action to curb the profiteers, so called, and reduce the profits of the middlemen in order to reduce the present high cost of living. This movement has been in action for over two months, but the statistics as gathered officially by the Department of Labor show that during the month of December, 1919, the average cost of living increased 5 per cent. This bill is not only a measure of justice to the few surviving veterans of the Armies of the Union, but it is a humane measure that every patriotic American citizen will approve.

The average age of the surviving soldiers of the Civil War is a trifle over 72 years. They are fast passing away. We have been busy in Congress during the past six months in increasing the salaries of the civilians in the employ of the Government; the increases running about an equal per cent with the increase provided in this bill. And these increases have been given to officials largely in the prime of life. How much more need to do justice to the men now tottering to a near-by grave, who in their young manhood offered up their lives for the integrity and perpetuity of this Union of States.

Gettysburg, Vicksburg, Atlanta, Franklin, and Nashville can speak to us no more with tongues of lurid flame. They are silent for all the coming ages, but their silence is more eloquent of national destiny than all the orators of the past from Thermopylae to Appomattox.

We are living in a sordid commercial time. We are fast parting with the old ideals, when justice was glorified in the simple home life and applause was showered on the soldiers of patriotism. Let us make a heroic effort to revive the old spirit and show by righteous legislation that this Nation has not forgotten her vows. Let us give substantial recognition to the greatest soldiers of humanity the world has ever known and make their last days on earth comfortable and fill their hearts with an all-absorbing sense of the Nation's gratitude.

We can not recall the valiant dead who sleep in 70 national cemeteries and in every village graveyard and rehabilitate them in the robes of flesh. We can not pour out our long withheld bounty, kept in closed coffers all the weary years in the face of bitter needs. But we can do justice to the living and give to the fast-fading remnant of the men behind the guns, who did the hardest work of war, a small portion of what is theirs by right of inheritance and place their names on the honor roll of the Republic.

OF

HON. JAMES H. SINCLAIR,

OF NORTH DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, December 20, 1919.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a statement by the Public Ownership League of America, accompanying the petition for public ownership of the railroads. The matter above referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE PUBLIC OWNERSHIP LEAGUE OF AMERICA, ACCOMPANYING THE PETITION FOR PUBLIC OWNERSHIP OF THE RAILROADS, PRESENTED BY REPRESENTATIVE JAMES H. SINCLAIR, OF NORTH DAKOTA.

To the Members of the Congress:

The Public Ownership League of America is presenting to your honorable body, through Congressman JAMES H. SINCLAIR, of North Dakota, a petition for the permanent public ownership of the railroads. This petition has been circulated by the members and friends of this league in 38 different States, representing, as you must know, a widespread and rapidly growing sentiment among the great masses of the common people of America.

In this connection permit us to draw the attention of your honorable body to the fact that this petition expresses an earnest sentiment and a deep conviction among our people that is vastly greater than is generally known or appreciated. Fourteen railway brotherhoods, representing over two millions of organized labor; organized farmers representing at least a half million more of our citizenry; organized miners representing hundreds of thousands of men employed in mining; besides numerous civic and commercial bodies, are already definitely and officially urging the retention and permanent public ownership of the railroads.

Besides these bodies which are nonpolitical in form, there are, as you know, several bodies of a distinctly political nature which represent the political expression of the same demand, viz, the so-called committee of forty-eight, the recently formed Labor Party, the National Nonpartisan League, and others. The aggregate number of American citizens in these various political bodies is also very large. And, finally, besides these bodies of organized citizens, there is perhaps an even greater number of unorganized citizens who represent the general public who desire and demand the public ownership of the railroads.

Thus there is behind this petition a great host of earnest, sincere citizens of our country, who believe that the future welfare of the Nation, the normal development of its commerce and industry, the opening of new territory, and the general prosperity of our people demand the permanent public ownership of the transportation system.

We would further point out to you that the passage of either the Cummins or the Esch bill now pending before your body, both of which provide for the return of the railroads to private ownership, would inevitably involve the Nation and its people in difficulties and burdens so serious that they threaten the peace and prosperity of the people.

It is well known by all that the return of the railroads at this time under the terms proposed by the bills now pending would mean a sharp increase in transportation rates. A 25 per cent increase of rates would mean $875,000,000 additional cost of transportation annually; and, assuming that Director General Hines's estimates are substantially correct, that would mean an increase of $4,375,000,000 a year in the cost of living—a burden which the American people, already nearly crushed with the high cost of living, can hardly carry.

On the other hand, if the Government retains the roads under public control for two to five years longer as proposed by the minority of the Senate committee, by the Farmers' National Council, the American Federation of Labor, and originally by Director General of Railways W. G. McAdoo, and later by his successor, Walker D. Hines; and if, as urged by this petition and the Public Ownership League of America, the Government shall meanwhile proceed to establish the permanent public ownership of the railroads, we may by this means secure a reduction of transportation charges, and thereby a reduction in the cost of living, to the infinite relief of the people and the immeasurable advantage of the Nation in every way.

We therefore urge upon your honorable body most earnest consideration of our petition, to the end that the permanent public ownership of railways may be accomplished at the earliest possible date.

Most respectfully,

PUBLIC OWNERSHIP LEAGUE OF AMERICA,
CARL D. THOMPSON, Secretary,
1439 Unity Building, Chicago, Ill.

CHICAGO, December 15, 1919.

Bill (H. R. 11224) to Exclude from the United States Aliens Who Are Members of the Anarchistic and Similar Classes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES V. GANLY,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, December 20, 1919.

Mr. GANLY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am heartily in favor of this bill, and while I think that it should go a great deal further and not alone deport from our shores those aliens who have violated our Constitution and laws but also should take away from those of the same class who have been admitted to citizenship in this country their citizenship by naturalization, and they also should be deported.

I have received many letters from the people of my district demanding that some action be taken by Congress to rid us of this revolutionary and anarchistic element. We have come to a pretty pass when the men who fought for our country and who attempted to parade in the streets in uniform are shot down and murdered by these assassins. Therefore, it is no wonder that the people of this country are demanding that their Representatives in Congress pass laws which will forever prohibit from entering our shores men who are sent here for the sole purpose of destruction.

This bill is a step in that direction, but I sincerely hope that the committee will continue this good work and that they will not stop until they have perfected a bill which forever protects this country from this damnable evil.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM W. LARSEN,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, December 18, 1919.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 14, 1919, contains remarks made by me on agricultural and live-stock advancement in Georgia.

In view of recent developments, which further substantiate my statements and conclusions at that time, I feel inclined to bring to the attention of the House an editorial appearing in the Cochran (Ga.) Journal, under date of December 11. It is as follows:

At the International Swine Show at Chicago last week Quality Orion King, jr., a son of the famous Orion Cherry King, jr., won the grand championship of the world against all Durocs shown. This hog was raised in Bleckley County by Peacock & Hodge. They had just sold Orion Cherry King, jr., for $16,500 and carried his son to the greatest show on record and won the grand championship of the world, making him the ranking hog of the entire Duroc breed.

Mr. W. H. Peacock, a member of the firm who own this boar, was elected president of the American Duroc Jersey Association at its last meeting in Chicago. He is only 35 years of age and the youngest man who has ever held this important position. The association has between four and five thousand members—they hail from nearly every State in the Union. This is an honor not only for Mr. Peacock, but for our county, the State of Georgia, and, for that matter, the entire South, as our section has been recognized only for a few years as a hog-growing section.

In this connection it gives us pleasure to state that Mullis & Patrick, of our county, own Carter's choice grand champion Hampshire boar of the world, who won his laurels at the international show at Chicago in 1918. This gives Bleckley County two grand champion hogs, representing both the Duroc and Hampshire breeds, and is a distinction, as far as we can learn, held by no other county in the Southeast. Both of these hogs were bred and raised in Georgia, which places our State "right on top."

The article not only shows the live-stock activities in Georgia, but its financial potentialities as well, and should be an inspiration not only to the citizens of that State but to the entire South.

Making Gold Certificates Legal Tender.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDMUND PLATT,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, December 19, 1919.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, this bill, S. 3458, which has passed the Senate, making gold certificates legal tender, is a bill of only seven lines, and when understood I am sure will pass without objection. Nine hundred and ninety-nine people out of every thousand believe gold certificates are legal tender now, but once in a while there is a smart lawyer who knows they are not, and when taken into court to make a tender of "lawful money" on a contract which somebody may be wanting to squeal out of that occasional smart lawyer makes trouble. Hence the banks find it necessary to keep on hand considerable amounts of high-value greenbacks, or United States notes, to satisfy occasional demands for legal tender.

The bill is advocated as a means of relieving the present shortage of $1 and $2 bills, and some explanation is due the House as to how it can accomplish such a result. There are no gold certificates in existence of a less denomination than $10, and the great bulk of them are larger—up to $10,000 bills. Evidently, these gold certificates can not be directly used to increase the supply of small bills. But, indirectly, making them legal tender will accomplish just that result, because it will enable the banks to use them for the occasional purpose I have described above and they can then safely send in their high-value greenbacks to the Treasury, which can at once replace them with small bills.

Your committee is informed that the Treasury has already printed a good supply of $1 and $2 United States notes, but they can only be issued in place of worn-out United States notes sent in for replacement or in place of higher value bills—$5, $10, $50, $100, and $1,000 bills. As soon as this bill passes enough of these high value bills can be obtained from the Federal reserve banks to enable the Treasury to put out a sufficient supply of small bills to afford considerable relief.

The shortage of small bills has been increased considerably because of the fact that silver certificates in considerable amounts have been withdrawn from circulation, and the silver dollars which were held to redeem them have been melted and sold for bullion. So far as this was done by the Government itself the silver certificates were replaced by Federal reserve bank notes in small denominations, but the advancing price of silver—now above $1.2929 an ounce, which is the coinage value of the dollars at the established ratio—has caused a continuance of the withdrawal of silver certificates since operations under the Pittman act of April 23, 1918, were discontinued. We shall be fortunate if the advance in the price of silver does not go far enough to menace our subsidiary silver coins, the bullion value of which is $1.38. Already silver has once been to $1.37½, but for the past few weeks it has fluctuated between $1.30 and $1.33, and the weight of our outstanding silver dollars, some $300,000,000, inside and outside of the Treasury, seems likely to keep it there for some time to come.

Monthly statements were issued by the Treasurer of the United States showing paper currency of each denomination outstanding down to April 30, 1919, but since then have not been published, though compiled for the Treasurer each month, with the exception of Federal reserve notes. According to these statements, silver certificates were decreasing slowly even before the Pittman Act was passed, in April, 1918. There were outstanding November 30, 1917, $484,680,000 in silver certificates, of which $10,000 were held in the Treasury. On January 31, 1918, the amount outstanding had fallen to $476,640,000, and on March 30, $464,904,000. On April 30, after the passage of the Pittman Act, the amount of silver certificates outstanding was $455,888,000, of which $281,776,362 was in $1 and $2 bills. Silver certificates up to that time furnished the great bulk of the ones and twos, as there were outstanding only $505,469 in $1 and $2 national-bank notes and only $51,777,668 in United States notes of those denominations.

On January 31, 1919, outstanding silver certificates had fallen to $283,083,000, of which $196,925,852 was in $1 and $2 bills, while small United States notes of the same denomination had risen to $128,110,353 and Federal reserve bank notes, which were issued specifically to take the place of the silver certificates called in under the Pittman Act, had risen from $11,742,955 April 30, 1918, to $138,250,180, of which $89,020,600 were ones and twos.

On October 31, 1919, when the last available statement was compiled, outstanding silver certificates had fallen to $180,265,400, of which $95,981,177 were $1 bills and $25,888,740 $2 bills, while Federal reserve bank notes to the amount of $269,642,800 had been issued, of which $174,241,436 were ones and $46,624,384 were twos. Greenback $1 bills to the amount of $111,905,415 were then outstanding, and $40,655,103 of greenback $2 bills.

The demand for small bills seems to be constantly increasing, and according to the monthly statements above quoted there are $131,518,964 more of $1 bills outstanding now—that is October 31—than on April 30, 1918.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD E. BROWNE,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents, and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, under the suspension of the rules the time limited for discussing this bill is one hour, to be divided between those in favor and those opposed to the bill. This limitation on the time prevents anything but a brief statement. I wish to go on record in favor of this bill.

I have favored all pension legislation that has passed Congress during my membership. Conceding that our Government has been fairly liberal with its Civil War veterans in the past, this increase should nevertheless be made. Pensions that were adequate a few years ago are grossly inadequate now. The cost of living has more than doubled since the last pension bill became a law.

VETERANS GROWING OLD.

Fifty years have passed since Lee's surrender at Appomattox. Boys that were 16 years of age then are men 70 years of age now. Many of these veterans are in very feeble health. Their wounds and disabilities have become more serious and burdensome each year. The chairman of the Pension Committee has informed us that between sunrise and sunset each day 130 Civil War veterans are passing away. It will not be many years that the Government will have an opportunity to do for the veterans of the Civil War. Each year exacts a heavier toll. I therefore hope that this bill will be enacted into law at the very earliest possible time. This bill provides for the widows of soldiers, as well as their dependents, and also the Civil War nurses. Let it not be said that Republics are ungrateful.

George Rogers Clark, the great soldier and explorer whose discovery of the Northwest Territory gave this country an empire of land which would have gone to Great Britain, died in poverty. As a recognition of his valuable services an early Congress passed a resolution commending his work and presenting him with a sword. The committee that made the presentation found the old gentleman living in a little cottage in the West. After their presentation speeches the old man sat unmoved and, when asked if he wished to reply, said to the committee: "Take back the trinket and tell Congress that when I needed a sword in the defense of my country I found one, but now I need bread."

ECONOMY.

The opposition to this bill use the argument of economy. I believe in economy and have opposed many appropriations on the ground that we could not afford it at this time. When economy is invoked to defeat this bill, that deals in thousands of cases with the very necessities of life, with men in feeble health, men more than threescore years and ten, men who offered their lives in the defense of their flag and their country, the argument of economy should not be considered.

The last Congress appropriated $100,000,000 to feed the people of foreign lands. Let us not neglect the Civil War veteran, his widow, and his dependents, of whom Lincoln pledged this Government in the following words:

To care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphans.

I urge the immediate passage of this bill, a copy of which I make a part of these remarks.

A bill to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents, and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc., That every person who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, or who, having so served less than 90 days, was discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, and who is now in receipt of, or entitled to receive under existing law, a pension of less than $50 per month, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

SEC. 2. That every person who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, or who, having so served less than 90 days, was discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, and who is now, or hereafter may become, by reason of age and physical disabilities, helpless or blind, or so nearly helpless or blind as to require the constant or regular aid and attendance of another person, shall be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $72 per month.

SEC. 3. That from and after the approval of this act all persons whose names are on the pension roll, and who, while in the service of the United States in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps during the Civil War, and in the line of duty, shall have lost one hand or one foot, or been totally disabled in the same, or shall have sustained a disability equivalent thereto, shall receive a pension at the rate of $60 per month; that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost an arm at or above the elbow, or a leg at or above the knee, or been totally disabled in the same, or shall have sustained a disability equivalent thereto, shall receive a pension at the rate of $65 per month; that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost an arm at the shoulder joint or a leg at the hip joint, or so near the shoulder or hip joint, or where the same is in such condition as to prevent the use of an artificial limb, or shall have sustained a disability equivalent thereto, shall receive a pension at the rate of $72 per month; and that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost one hand and one foot, or been totally disabled in the same, or shall have sustained a disability equivalent thereto, shall receive a pension at the rate of $90 per month.

SEC. 4. That the widow of any person who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War for 90 days or more, and was honorably discharged from such service, or, regardless of the length of service, was discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, such widow having been married to such soldier, sailor, or marine prior to the 27th day of June, A. D. 1915, shall be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $30 per month. And this section shall apply to all former widows of persons who served for 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War and were honorably discharged from such service, or who, having so served for less than 90 days, were discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, such widow having remarried, either once or more than once, after the death of the soldier, sailor, or marine, if it be shown that such subsequent or successive marriage has or have been dissolved, either by the death of the husband or husbands, or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife, and any such former widow shall be entitled to and be paid a pension at the rate of $30 per month; and any widow as mentioned in this section shall also be paid $6 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow, having a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16 years: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of such child, or during the period of such disability, and this proviso shall apply to all pensions heretofore granted or hereafter to be granted under this or any former statute: And provided further, That in case of any widow whose name has been dropped from the pension roll because of her remarriage, if the pension has been granted to an insane, idiotic, or otherwise helpless child, or to a child or children under the age of 16 years, she shall not be entitled to renewal of pension under this act until that pension to such child or children terminates, unless such child or children be a member or members of her family and cared for by her, and upon the renewal of pension to such widow payment of pension to such child or children shall cease.

SEC. 5. That all Army nurses of the Civil War, and all dependent parents of any officer or enlisted man who served in the Civil War whose names are now on the pension roll, or who are now entitled to pension under any existing law, shall be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

SEC. 6. That the pension or increase of pension herein provided for, as to all persons whose names are now on the pension roll, or who are now in receipt of a pension under existing law, shall commence at the rates herein provided, from the date of the approval of this act, or under section 2 hereof when the requisite condition is shown to exist after the approval of this act; and as to persons whose names are not now on the pension roll, or who are not now in receipt of a pension under existing law, but who may be entitled to pension under the provisions of this act, such pensions shall commence from the date of filing application therefor in the Bureau of Pensions, in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That as to any former widow as mentioned in section 4 hereof who, since the death of her soldier, sailor, or marine husband, has remarried either once or more than once, and such subsequent or successive marriage has been dissolved, either by the death of the husband or husbands or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife, and who filed her application for pension under the act of September 8, 1916, her pension shall commence from the date when her original application was filed under that act in the Bureau of Pensions, and shall be at the rate in that act provided, with increase at the rate or rates subsequently provided for the widows of Civil War soldiers, sailors, and marines, and by this act, from the date or dates when any such subsequent act or acts took effect or may hereafter take effect, it being the intent and purpose to give to any such widow the same status as other widows of Civil War soldiers, sailors, and marines who have not remarried and from the date of said act of September 8, 1916.

SEC. 7. That nothing in this act contained shall be held to affect or diminish the additional pension to those on the roll designated as "The Army and Navy medal of honor roll," as provided in the act of April 27, 1906, but any increase herein provided for shall be in addition thereto; and no pension heretofore granted under any act, public or private, shall be reduced by anything contained in this act.

SEC. 8. That no claim agent or attorney or other person shall be recognized in the adjustment of claims under this act, except in claims for original pension, and in such cases no more than the sum of $10 shall be allowed for services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any such claim, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension allowed or due to such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500, or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. McKINLEY,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems very fitting that the first bill to pass the House of Representatives after returning from our Christmas holiday should be this one increasing the monthly payments to the soldiers of the Civil War and to their widows.

During this two weeks' vacation we have had the leisure to enjoy the comforts of home, appreciate the luxuries of our advanced civilization, and recognize more than ever the feeling of safety and stability coming to us because of the fact that we are a united and powerful Nation, made so by the sacrifices of this rapidly disappearing band of heroes whose rights we in a small way recognize to-day. I am sure the Members of Congress are one with me in the feeling of regret that on account of the multitude of demands of this great Nation it is impossible for us at this time to make this monthly payment a larger amount.

I know I voice the mind of my colleagues when I say that we are also alive to the just claims upon a willing people of the young men who are now resuming their places in civil life after two or more years spent in the service of their country in bringing this World War to a successful conclusion. Those of us who are not members of the committees having the welfare of these returning millions of soldiers in charge stand ready with our votes to enact into laws such legislation as will properly benefit these young men who unselfishly risked their lives for humanity and for the just rights of man all over the world.

I have frequently heard rural mail carriers bitterly complain of what they designate as the bureaucrats of Washington sitting down in Washington at a desk and laying out rural routes from a map that was perfectly flat and smooth, regardless of the fact that one route might be over the level prairies upon a hard road and another route in the clay hills with nothing but mud to plow through.

So, also, when we take a map of the United States the swamps of Florida, the cut-over sand barrens of northern Wisconsin, and the bad lands of Montana have the same satisfactory appearance as the fertile prairies of Iowa and Kansas. I have frequently visited all these regions. I know the difference. I know that I can not satisfy my conscience by voting a law that would wish so-called benefits of this kind upon the brave youth, just starting in life with the hope of bringing up a family among the comforts of civilization.

It seems to me some feasible plan must be worked out, and I can not help but feel that the recommendations of the soldiers' organizations, especially the American Legion, should be given careful consideration.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MOSES P. KINKAID,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, December 20, 1919,

On the bill (H. R. 11224) to amend the act entitled "An act to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes," approved October 16, 1918.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the pending bill is to supplement and to duplicate in part existing law, because of the difference in the interpretation given the statute by the administrative and executive officials from that intended by the Congress when the measure was enacted. Because of the very restrictive interpretation placed upon the statute by these administrative officers the consensus of opinion of the members of the Committee on Immigration is that some aliens, who are in fact anarchists, and as such should have been ordered deported, have been found entitled to remain in the United States. The provisions of this bill will make more specific and certain the meaning intended by the Congress. However, it is the general understanding of the membership that with the bill enacted the statutes will still be inadequate to meet the demands of the present situation, but the Committee on Immigration, reporting the bill, had not jurisdiction to report a more comprehensive measure. But several bills designed to complete legislation for the purpose in question are pending and have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is promised that a bill containing ample provisions for the purpose in view shall be reported to the House at an early date.

I shall not go into the details of the pending measure but shall print it at the end of my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I would be doing an injustice to my feelings and conscience to let the present opportunity pass without giving my unqualified sanction to the purpose of the pending bill, and what I shall say I desire to be so construed. But what I deem more important is to emphasize that, in my judgment, neither the Congress nor the country has become sufficiently awakened to the impending menace of anarchy.

Times have been so eventful since the commencement of the war that threats of anarchy, even including the attempts made at assassination of public officials, have not duly impressed the public with the gravity of the situation. Other problems of a momentous character have also been exacting attention of the Congress and the people. The result has been that even a case so conspicuous as that of the attempt to assassinate the Attorney General of the United States was mentioned in the leading papers and talked of but a few days, until new sensations were afforded to divide the attention of the public. But, while passing, it is proper to observe that this instance may ever be remembered as a remarkable case of simultaneous, retributive justice, as the would-be assassin was himself annihilated by the bomb he threw, or was about to throw, for the destruction of the Attorney General.

The success—I might say triumph—of anarchy in a part of Russia ought to be a sufficient warning of the danger to the whole world which is actually impending; and it is a fact that that ascendency has given anarchy a great impetus throughout Europe, at the same time affecting the United States. The rapid growth of anarchy has become marked in parts of Spain, Italy, and, in a less degree, in France. But even in France, in the campaign preceding the recent election, the patriotic people found it expedient to act with diplomacy until the election had been won. Fortunately, a decisive victory was secured under the virile leadership of the preeminent Clemenceau.

We are being daily admonished by the press concerning the propaganda and growing activities of this element in different large cities throughout the United States, and it is made clear that their numbers have been rapidly increasing and that their leaders, having been somewhat restrained and repressed by war measures while hostilities lasted, have become more bold and defiant since the signing of the armistice. One of their number publicly announced only a few days ago, "The revolution is now on, but conservatives can not read the handwriting on the wall." Additional warning should not be required, but preparation should be made to meet the enemy.

A few years back—say, 10 years ago—it was officially estimated that anarchists numbered about 1,000,000 throughout the world. How many times this number has since been multiplied no one can definitely state, but it is undoubtedly true that since the Czar of Russia was dethroned their numbers have increased in great proportions. While conditions have been more favorable to its spread in Europe than in the United States, the investigations instigated by our Department of Justice during the month of June of this year disclose the likelihood of the existence of many more thousands of anarchists in our large cities than previous to that time the public had had any reason to expect. This makes plain that it is imperative and exigent that steps be immediately taken by our Government not only to preclude the further expansion of anarchy but to exterminate such as may be found now to exist in our country.

Anarchy is defined in Everybody's Cyclopedia as follows:

A revolutionary sect or body setting forth as the social ideal the extreme form of individual freedom, and holding that all government is injurious and immoral; that the destruction of every social form now existing must be the first step to the creation of a new world. Their recognition as an independent sect may be dated from the secession of Bakunin and his followers from the Social Democrats at the Congress of The Hague in 1872, since which they have maintained an active propaganda.

See Webster's Dictionary:

Want of government; a state of society in which there is no law or supreme power; general confusion; lawless disorder; a disorganized state of affairs; chaos.

Synonyms are "lawlessness, disorder, tumult, rebellion, riot, insubordination." Anarchy "looks upon all law and government as the source of all the evils existing in society," therefore advocates the abolition of all government. Anarchists regard mankind as gregarious. "Our object is to live without government and without law," said Reclus, a leading anarchist of France. "Governments are the scourge of God," said Joseph Proudhon, born in France in 1809, with whom the philosophy of modern anarchy may be said to have begun.

There are two general divisions of anarchists, the evolutionary and the revolutionary. The evolutionary branch does not advocate the overthrow of government, law, and order by violence, but strives to accomplish this by propaganda. The number of this branch is comparatively small. On the other hand, the revolutionaries employ all the means of destruction required to dethrone government and law and order established thereunder, and this class is now in the ascendancy and increasing rapidly. Berkman and Goldman are of this class.

All branches of anarchy are opposed to the individual ownership of property. Brissot announced the philosophy, "Property is robbery," meaning that the ownership of property by an individual is robbery of the people at large. The revolutionaries would appropriate private property to their own use by employing such destructive means as need be. Different from bank robbers and train robbers, who appear suddenly and depart quickly after plundering the few, for fear of apprehension by officers of the law, revolutionary anarchists come as an invading and devastating army, making a clean sweep as they go of all banks, factories, mines, farms, live stock, and every other kind of property, and then establish anarchy as a substitute for government and law.

Present-day revolutionary anarchists condemn the State and church as stumbling blocks to progress, and define patriotism as a "superstition" and "disease." Altogether the essence of anarchy is a degeneracy of civilized life. If truth, justice, and civilization are fallacious, even vicious, then we may turn to anarchy for perfection. All endeavor for true progress under constitutions, State and National, and the forms of law established thereunder are legitimate and deserve encouragement, but any movement to overthrow Government ,with the present standards of civilization, by destructive methods should be immediately met with sufficient governmental power to exterminate it. But anarchy defines itself by concrete examples. Here are some: The assassinations by anarchists of President Carnot, of France, in 1894; of Empress Elizabeth, of Austria, in 1898; of King Humbert, of Italy, in 1900; and of President McKinley by Czolgosz in the fall of 1901. During the period covered by these assassinations attempts were made to assassinate different members of royal families in Europe.

What would I recommend as a remedy?

I would have continue the deportation of all alien anarchists beyond the seas until no more such can be found in the United States. Then I would establish an ironclad embargo against the admission into the United States of actual anarchists and all possessed of such proclivities. I would provide for an effective quarantine of citizens of the United States, native born or naturalized, found to espouse or teach the overthrow of this Government by the destructive methods employed by revolutionary anarchists; I would so quarantine until permanent remedies could be provided. I would safeguard our citizenship for the future by proper immigration laws.

As showing the importance of instituting immediate preventative measures, I may properly mention that a publicist has recently called attention to what he deems to be fact, that if the Congress had not enacted the Chinese exclusion law the result of Chinese immigration into the United States would have been so great that Mongolians would have by this time outnumbered the whites in all the Pacific Coast States. If anarchists are to be permitted to immigrate into the United States from European countries, and at the same time allowed to develop, increase, and multiply here, it may be only a question of time until their numbers will equal the number of citizens loyal to our Government.

I would look well to the education of American youth from the primary schools up to and including the colleges and universities, for it is lamentably the fact that in high schools in some of the large cities, and here and there in colleges and universities, teachers and professors have heretofore been found who abused the privileges of their positions by planting the germs of anarchistic ideas in the minds of those whom they are employed to teach. While it is true that more and more attention is being given by schools and colleges to the fitting of students for the responsibilities of good citizenship, I am of the opinion that the efforts in this direction should be materially increased. However, I acknowledge that I do not possess up-to-date information on the progress that is now being made in schools and colleges to inculcate love and loyalty for our governmental institutions.

The George Junior Republic, at Freeville, N. Y., is one of the most prominent educational enterprises of this character. There children from 12 to 18 years make their own laws and enforce them in their own courts; have their own judicial and administrative officers; punish their own criminals by placing them in actual cells, with hard labor imposed when deserved. It is claimed by some who are acquainted with this school that boy and girl public opinion has been found to be more frank and positive than with adults. Unfortunately it is likely to prove true that the ideals formed by the time education is completed are not improved upon in later years.

It is the opinion of some publicists that one of the chief provinces of the State is to build up citizenship, while another scholar has propounded the question, "What makes a State?" and answered, "Men, high-minded men." And we may find verification of the truth of this answer in the fact that the history of a State consists principally of the biographies of the factors who have builded it. I agree with Emerson that "The true test of civilization is not the census, nor the size of cities, nor the crops—no, but the kind of men the country turns out."

The Fuller Civil War Pension Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY Z. OSBORNE,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920.

On the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, it affords me great and peculiar pleasure to speak and vote for this bill as it has been reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions through its distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER]. While no bill dealing with a great purpose, like this bill, was ever absolutely perfect, it is evident that the committee having the matter in charge has given this proposed enactment most thorough, intelligent, and patriotic consideration, and they have evolved a pension measure the fairest and most equitable that has ever been presented to Congress through a favorable committee report.

It is well, Mr. Speaker, that we have Members on this floor who carefully guard the Treasury of the Nation from undue drafts upon its resources. They often apply a much-needed brake, and limit appropriations, or deny them, to possible worthy objects that the conditions of the country can not afford. They perform a useful and often not overpopular duty. I sometimes think, however, that in their zeal for economy they are not sufficiently discriminating, and fail to see the difference between an expenditure dictated by the highest considerations of national honor and interest and others of downright extravagance.

I maintain that this pension bill and all of its predecessors from the Revolutionary War to the present time have been based upon regard for the Nation's honor and interest. It is the history of all our wars that when a war is on some men go to war and others do not. Those who remain at home go on about their business, live comfortably, and have all the opportunity to increase their means and their position in life. Some succeed and make money or improve themselves by experience or education. The man who goes to war drops everything, cuts himself off from all the activities of life during his term of service. If he is in process of gaining an education, of learning a business or a trade, that ambition is halted at the date of his enlistment, and he is fortunate if he ever resumes where he left off. If he is gone a year or two or three years, and is fortunate enough to return home, more often than otherwise he finds conditions entirely changed, so that he resumes civil life under the most serious disadvantages.

We are here considering the situation of the most fortunate soldiers—those who have not contracted chronic or permanent disease in and as a result of service, who have not been maimed or deprived of a limb or eyesight, who have not been killed in battle or died of wounds. The condition of such wounded and diseased veterans is vastly worse than is that of their sound comrades. How greatly has their chance for success in life been reduced! No thoughtful mind can contemplate their situation without the conviction that they have all sacrified much of that which is most valuable in life—some of life itself—for their country. For their country; that is, for you and me, for our children, for our civilization and society and institutions.

I do not think that most old soldiers claim service pensions as a right. They do claim that those who were disabled in service have a right to compensatory consideration. But those Civil War veterans who were not actually disabled realize that they received $13 per month during their term of service, the pay as then fixed by law, and that legally they had no further claim upon the Government. The question is not what the old soldiers themselves think about it, however, but what the people of the United States, as represented by their Congress and Government, think about it. Are the people satisfied to settle down to the conclusion that, as the Civil War soldiers received the $13 per month agreed upon, there is nothing more to be done about it? Rigid economy and a strict construction of obligations as fixed by "the letter of the bond" might reach that conclusion.

But there is a much higher, more lofty, and far more practical idea of national obligation and policy. Theodore Roosevelt had a clear conception of that more exalted policy when as President he practically directed the Bureau of Pensions to assume the age of 62 years, when reached by a veteran of the Civil War, to be prima facie evidence of disability. Afterwards Congress embodied that assumption into law, and created service pensions dependent upon age, commencing at 62 years.

The high, lofty, and practical ideal is that no great nation will permit the men who have served it in war, and who have undergone the sacrifices inevitably incident to such service, and which have not been suffered by other men who have not been soldiers, to go unrecognized, or be subjected to utter deprivation when helpless from wounds, disease, or old age. No nation is great which would permit such things. No nation would survive that so neglected its warriors and saviors as to discourage entry into military service in time of war.

Thank God, no such niggardly record mars the history of the United States! We have from the beginning of our Government honored the soldiers who have sacrificed the comforts of life and its treasured advances in the paths of peace and bared their breasts to the blasts of battle. Thus the soldiers of the Revolutionary War were pensioned down to the time of the Mexican War. In turn, the veterans of the Mexican War were pensioned. This policy of broad statesmanship undoubtedly left its impress on the public mind. And, although during the Civil War I do not remember hearing mention of a pension, except possibly for severe wounds and loss of a member, and while I do not believe that one soldier in a hundred thousand ever thought of a pension as a possibility or in any way, the general impression prevailed that the United States Government—the best Government on the face of the earth—would always do the right thing by its soldiers under any and all circumstances. The Government has justified that impression, and it will continue to do so as long as it is a great government, until the last soldier of the Civil War, honored to the end of his life by his fellow countrymen, has passed to his final reward. It will continue to do so until every young soldier of the late World War, fair-haired and in the flush of early youth, has passed along the stream of years so that the fair hair has grown white, and, when they have reached old age, if fortune shall have withheld from them the competence which smooths declining years, the United States Government will not desert them, but will provide them with food and shelter to the end of their days. No soldier of the Civil War has ever been compelled to live upon charity. The Soldiers' Homes, which are homes in fact as well as in theory, are always open to all, and any soldier whose circumstances make it desirable for him to enter. He becomes a "member" of the home, not an "inmate." It is actually his home, so established by law, although for short periods that fact has not been fully recognized by some Soldiers' Home officers. Generally, however, the homes are humanely and beneficently managed, and upon the theory that they are really homes for the soldiers and not "institutions."

The admirable bill under discussion, known as the Fuller Civil War pension bill, in full, is as follows:

A bill to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents, and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc., That every person who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, or who, having so served less than 90 days, was discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty and who is now in receipt of, or entitled to receive under existing law, a pension of less than $50 per month, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

SEC. 2. That every person who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, or who, having so served less than 90 days, was discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, and who is now, or hereafter may become, by reason of age and physical disabilities, helpless or blind, or so nearly helpless or blind as to require the constant or regular aid and attendance of another person, shall be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $72 per month.

SEC. 3. That from and after the approval of this act all persons whose names are on the pension roll, and who, while in the service of the United States in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps during the Civil War, and in the line of duty, shall have lost one hand or one foot, or been totally disabled in the same or shall have sustained a disability equivalent thereto, shall receive a pension at the rate of $60 per month; that all persons who, in such serivce and in like manner shall have lost an arm at or above the elbow, or a leg at or above the knee, or been totally disabled in the same, or shall have sustained a disability equivalent thereto, shall receive a pension at the rate of $65 per month; that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost an arm at the shoulder joint or a leg at the hip joint, or so near the shoulder or hip joint, or where the same is in such condition as to prevent the use of an artificial limb, or shall have sustained a disability equivalent thereto, shall receive a pension at the rate of $72 per month; and that all persons who, in such service and in like manner shall have lost one hand and one foot, or been totally disabled in the same, or shall have sustained a disability equivalent thereto, shall receive a pension at the rate of $90 per month.

SEC. 4. That the widow of any person who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War for 90 days or more, and was honorably discharged from such service, or regardless of the length of service was discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, such widow having been married to such soldier, sailor, or marine prior to the 27th day of June, Anno Domini 1915, shall be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $30 per month. And this section shall apply to all former widows of persons who served for 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War and were honorably discharged from such service, or who, having so served for less than 90 days, were discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, such widow having remarried, either once or more than once after the death of the soldier, sailor, or marine, if it be shown that such subsequent or successive marriage has, or have been dissolved, either by the death of the husband or husbands, or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife; and any such former widow shall be entitled to and be paid a pension at the rate of $30 per month; and any widow as mentioned in this section shall also be paid $6 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow, having a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16 years: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of such child, or during the period of such disability, and this proviso shall apply to all pensions heretofore granted or hereafter to be granted under this or any former statute: And provided further, That in case of any widow whose name has been dropped from the pension roll because of her remarriage, if the pension has been granted to an insane, idiotic, or otherwise helpless child, or to a child or children under the age of 16 years, she shall not be entitled to renewal of pension under this act until that pension to such child or children terminates, unless such child or children be a member or members of her family and cared for by her, and upon the renewal of pension to such widow, payment of pension to such child or children shall cease.

SEC. 5. That all Army nurses of the Civil War and all dependent parents of any officer or enlisted man who served in the Civil War whose names are now on the pension roll, or who are now entitled to pension under any existing law, shall be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

SEC. 6. That the pension or increase of pension herein provided for, as to all persons whose names are now on the pension roll, or who are now in receipt of a pension under existing law, shall commence at the rates herein provided, from the date of the approval of this act, or under section 2 hereof when the requisite condition is shown to exist after the approval of this act; and as to persons whose names are not now on the pension roll, or who are not now in receipt of a pension under existing law, but who may be entitled to pension under the provisions of this act, such pensions shall commence from the date of filing application therefor in the Bureau of Pensions, in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That as to any former widow as mentioned in section 4 hereof, who since the death of her soldier, sailor, or marine husband has remarried either once or more than once, and such subsequent or successive marriage has been dissolved either by the death of the husband or husbands, or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife, and who filed her application for pension under the act of September 8, 1916, her pension shall commence from the date when her original application was filed, under that act in the Bureau of Pensions, and shall be at the rate in that act provided, with increase at the rate or rates subsequently provided for the widows of Civil War soldiers, sailors, and marines, and by this act, from the date or dates when any such subsequent act or acts took effect or may hereafter take effect, it being the intent and purpose to give to any such widow the same status as other widows of Civil War soldiers, sailors, and marines, who have not remarried and from the date of said act of September 8, 1916.

SEC. 7. That nothing in this act contained shall be held to affect or diminish the additional pension to those on the roll designated as "The Army and Navy medal of honor roll" as provided in the act of April 27, 1906, but any increase herein provided for shall be in addition thereto; and no pension heretofore granted under any act, public or private, shall be reduced by anything contained in this act.

SEC. 8. That no claim agent or attorney or other person shall be recognized in the adjustment of claims under this act, except in claims for original pension, and in such cases no more than the sum of $10 shall be allowed for services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any such claim, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension allowed or due to such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

It will be noted that this bill raises the rate of all existing pensions of honorably discharged soldiers who served 90 days or more in the Civil War to $50 per month.

It raises the various rates for disability incurred in service, whether for more or less than 90 days.

It increases widows' and Army nurses' pensions to $30 per month, and those of orphans under 16 years of age from $2 to $6 per month.

It extends the limit of time within which widows come within the provisions of the bill for 10 years—from June 27, 1905, to June 27, 1915—so that widows of deceased soldiers married prior to June 27, 1915, are entitled to $30 per month.

A further provision is that widows of deceased soldiers who have remarried "either once or more than once after the death of the soldier," and whose subsequent successive marriages have been dissolved by death of the husband or husbands or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife, shall be paid a pension of $30 per month. Under former laws a widow who was remarried more than once was cut off from all pension, even after the death of the subsequent husbands.

If there be those who feel that $50 per month is too liberal a pension, I respectfully offer these suggestions:

Most of the recipients of these pensions are now very old persons and generally poor. There are some exceptions as to poverty. There are practically none under 70 years of age, and the average age is 77 or 78. They are passing away at the rate of 136 each 24 hours, and this ratio must necessarily increase month by month and year by year, thus rapidly decreasing the pension roll.

I am not complaining of what the Nation has done for the old soldiers in the past. I think that it has done well and with that high appreciation of their service that first found voice in the immortal address of Abraham Lincoln at Gettysburg. But now they are in advanced old age. They are to be with us but a few years. Ought we not to make those final years on earth of our honored veterans and of the venerable widows of those who have already passed as free from the fear of cold and hunger that are prone to afflict the aged as it is possible for the Nation to make them? I believe that this House, when the vote shall be finally taken on the bill, will decide by an overwhelming majority that such is the duty and the pleasure of the Nation, and that in so doing they will but reflect the prevailing overwhelming sentiment of America.

The report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted by its chairman, Judge FULLER, sums up the reasons for the passage of the bill in the following succinct and eloquent terms, which I sincerely and heartily indorse:

We have appropriated many millions to feed the people of foreign lands, a hundred millions at one time. Let us not forget our duty at home, especially to those to whom it was said that "The only national debt we can never pay is the debt we owe to our victorious Union soldiers, sailors, and marines." Also let us heed the admonition of Abraham Lincoln "To care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphans." While we have done, are doing, and will do all possible for the young soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late World War, let us not forget nor neglect the survivors of that great struggle of more than half a century ago, the benefits of which have been a rich inheritance to every person whose privilege it has been to live under the protecting folds of the flag of the Union they saved and perpetuated. It is a surprising fact that so many of those old veterans are alive and with us yet. On the 30th day of June last there were on the pension roll 271,391 survivors of that war; 293,244 widows of those who had died; 206 dependent parents of Union soldiers; 129 Civil War nurses; and 6,836 minor children. That this bill if enacted into law will cost the Government a large sum of money goes without saying, but in comparison with some other expenses the amount seems almost negligible.

The best estimates your committee have been able to obtain is that it will cost for the first year of its operation around $65,000,000, but this estimate is based on the number on the pension roll on the 30th of June last, and that number is much less now and is being reduced by deaths by several thousands every month, besides which it does not take into consideration the very large number of special cases which are being introduced and referred to the committee by the thousands, and which in the future will in most cases be unnecessary if this bill is passed. These old veterans are leaving us in rapidly increasing numbers, and very soon they and their deeds will be only a memory. What a grateful Government does for them must be done soon in order that they may receive the benefit while they live. It is perhaps proper to say that the provisions of this bill were unanimously indorsed with great enthusiasm by the members of the Grand Army of the Republic at their national encampment at Columbus this year, and have been indorsed by many of the local camps throughout the country.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. KING,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 8, 1920.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a resolution passed by representatives of several counties of Illinois, consisting of county superintendents of highways, chairmen of county boards, and chairmen of committees on State aid roads, assembled in convention at Quincy, Ill., December 6, 1919, on the subject of Federal distribution of autotrucks.

There was no objection.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas the Department of Agriculture has recently, under and by virtue of the provisions of an act of Congress, allotted 964 autotrucks to the State of Illinois for the use of the people of the several counties in the construction of roads; and

Whereas these autotrucks have been received by, and for some time last past have been and are now in the custody and control of the division of highways of the department of public works and buildings of Illinois, and are not to any considerable extent used or useful to the State department for actual work, but are being rented out to contractors and used in the construction and maintenance of the State-aid roads, and the income therefrom added to the receipts of the division of highways; and

Whereas it was the intention of Congress in enacting the law above referred to that these autotrucks should be allotted by the several States to the several counties within the States to be used for road purposes in the several counties; and

Whereas all of the counties in the State of Illinois are now engaged in the construction and maintenance of roads by county aid, and many of the counties in the State are constructing and maintaining roads on extensive and elaborate plans wholly by county aid; and use of these trucks by the several counties is absolutely necessary and essential to the carrying out of their road work and would result not only in a great saving to the counties, but also in greatly extending and expediting the work of road construction and maintenance; and

Whereas the division of highways has up to this time refused to allot these autotrucks to the several counties of the State of Illinois and persists in withholding the same from the several counties, contrary to the spirit of the act of Congress above mentioned: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the representatives of the several counties of this State, consisting of county superintendents of highways, chairmen of county boards, and chairmen of committees on State-aid roads, in convention assembled, in Quincy, Ill., this 6th day of December, A. D. 1919, That the withholding from the counties of this State by the division of highways of the allotment of autotrucks allotted by the Department of Agriculture to the State of Illinois is contrary to the spirit of the act of Congress in such behalf; that the action of the division of highways in such behalf is arbitrary, unwarranted, unjust, and unfair to the counties of this State; and further

Resolved, That demand be, and the same hereby is, made upon the division of highways of the State of Illinois to allot to the several counties of the State of Illinois the autotrucks allotted by the Department of Agriculture for the use of the people of the State of Illinois; and be it further

Resolved, That request be, and the same hereby is, made of the governor of the State of Illinois and of the Senators and Representatives of the State of Illinois in Congress that they immediately take action and use all honorable means to secure a proper construction of the act of Congress by the division of highways to the end that the proper allotment of such autotrucks among the several counties of this State may be made; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent by the Secretary of this convention to the governor of this State and the Senators from Illinois and the Representatives in Congress from the State of Illinois, and to the department of public works and buildings of Illinois, division of highways, and to the several county boards of supervisors of this State.

Wm. S. Henderson, chairman; Gilbert Lyons, secretary; Albert A. Schultze, chairman county board, Calhoun County; E. J. Grubb, chairman Adams County board of supervisors; Chas. H. Snyder, supervisor from Brown County; C. F. Mills, member Scott County board; John Goodell, county superintendent of highways, Cass County; Fred Twesten, superintendent Hancock County.

OF

HON. THETUS W. SIMS,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 9, 1920.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address of Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, before the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, New York City, Wednesday, January 7, 1920.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF WALKER D. HINES, DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS, BEFORE THE ASSOCIATION OF THE BAR OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, NEW YORK CITY, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 7, 1920.

"I wish, first, to summarize my thoughts on the solution of the railroad problem.

"For 26 years I have studied the development of railroad regulation. For most of this period I studied it from the standpoint of the railroad companies, and for the last two years I have studied it from the standpoint of the general public.

"As a preliminary to considering the solution, it is well to consider the condition of regulation in 1917, just prior to Federal control.

"While there were many different railroad companies, the service on the different railroads was inseparably linked in a common transportation system. Freight cars were interchangeable, rates were necessarily the same on different railroads in the same part of the country, wages of some classes of railroad labor were largely standardized, and others were to become so. Movements for either the increase or reduction of rates were joint and affected all the railroads in the particular territory, and movements for the increase of wages were likewise joint to a considerable extent and affected many railroads.

"Despite these elements of interrelation affecting service, rates, and wages, there were probably more than 100 distinct railroad interests, at least 50 of which could be regarded as important. It was almost impossible to secure joint action by these interests and almost impossible to accomplish results without joint action.

"Railroad labor was completely organized as to the train and engine men and was largely organized as to some of the other classes, and there was a steady movement toward further organization on the railroads throughout the country. Railroad labor had become violently opposed to arbitration and no means existed for satisfactory dealing with labor problems. Common action on the part of railroad labor was much easier than common action on the part of the railroad managements.

"Public regulation of the railroads was far reaching, both as to service and as to rates. Congress and the State legislatures and some State commissions were constantly making regulations affecting service and increasing the cost. The movement was steadily in the direction of greater and more costly regulation of railroad service. The regulation of rates was almost universal. The Interstate Commerce Commission had practically complete control over interstate rates, and nearly all the State commissions had control over the intrastate rates, and from time to time State legislatures directly fixed the rates. The railroad executives frequently complained that they had no substantial control over the management of the properties.

"The term private management had become largely figurative because important factors vitally affecting the control were largely prescribed by Congress and the Interstate Commerce Commission, by the State legislatures and the State commission, and by the various labor organizations.

"And yet while the public and labor through all these different agencies was directly dealing with the problems of railroad management there was no basis for securing common understanding by any two of these three interests. Each public agency worked by itself without reference to the railroad managements or labor, except through the medium of legal proceedings. The labor organizations formulated their policies and carried them out without reference either to the public or to the managements except in the course of arms-length negotiations. Each railroad management decided upon its own course as well as it could without the cooperation of either public representatives or labor representatives. The general result was a serious lack of understanding on the part of each of these three interests as to the point of view of the others.

"While there was so much public regulation there was no definiteness whatever as to the basis of regulation. There was the general idea that rates ought to be enough to enable the companies to earn a fair return upon the fair value, but neither a fair return nor the fair value was subject of ascertainment.

"Some of the railroads were prosperous and showed large earnings and large rates of return upon their investment and upon their stock, so large in fact as to be a constant invitation to attacks on the part of elements of the public and of political life seeking rate reductions, and so large also as to stimulate discontent on the part of railroad labor. Other railroads had such poor returns that they found it impossible to raise the money necessary for needed improvements. Yet the rates had to be the same and the wages had to be substantially the same on these railroads so differently circumstanced.

"On account of the great number of different railroad companies it was exceedingly difficult for them to concur in any affirmative program, either as to rates or as to wages, and it has become strikingly noticeable that the railroad companies had not succeeded in carrying out a satisfactory program for the interchange of freight cars. In times of car shortage it was impossible for a company to get its own cars back on its line, and hence it was unwilling to give up the cars of other companies when it obtained them, and at times a condition of practical anarchy existed in dealing with freight cars owned by other companies.

"The situation which I have depicted was frequently regarded as almost impossible by the railroad people. A joint congressional committee, known as the Newlands committee, was appointed to study the difficulties, but before it reported the war conditions came and Federal control began.

"There was widespread pessimism as to the railroad situation. Expenses were increasing and it seemed impossible to obtain increases in rates to reflect the increases in expenses. While there was much criticism of individuals in public authority, I wish to emphasize that it is my opinion that it was the system which was at fault and not the public authorities who administered the system. I do not believe any set of men could have been put in public office who could have made the system a success.

"I do not believe we will ever obtain an effective solution without removing the fundamental difficulties which I have suggested.

"First. I believe that there will not be a prompt and liberal treatment of rate questions until profits clearly in excess of a fair return are appropriated in part to the public interest.

"An an illustration, I have in mind one important railroad company whose railroad, even in this difficult year, will earn over 140 per cent of the standard return, and this company has in the past paid high dividends and in addition has had a large annual surplus. When the railroad companies apply for an increase in rates, it will inevitably be urged that an increase ought not to be granted which would still further increase the large profits of this company. For example, an increase of 20 per cent in the freight rates of this company would give it a net operating income more than twice the standard return, assuming that it continued to enjoy the same business. I have no doubt that such a prospect would stimulate the most persistent opposition to the increase, and the result might be that an increase seriously needed by other companies would be defeated simply because the giving of the increase would yield what would be regarded as a grossly excessive profit for this favored company. I see no way to meet such a situation except to provide for a division of the excess over a clearly reasonable return. Of course, enough of the excess should be given to the company to stimulate efficiency in operation, but beyond that point the fact that the company would get the excess would be a serious obstruction to the railroads in general getting an increase to which on the average they might be entitled. The excess thus appropriated for the public interest should be largely placed in reserves, so as to protect the general railroad situation in unfavorable years. Such a course would quiet agitation, would stabilize the situation, and without it I believe it would be impossible to get prompt and liberal treatment of any rate-increase question.

"I believe there must be a definite standard by which the reasonableness of the general rate level can be measured. In the past there has been no appreciable standard. Plausible arguments could be made against any increase that was sought under any conditions. The rate-making body had to take all the responsibility and odium of creating a standard as well as applying it. In my opinion Congress itself should establish a general but workable standard and leave to the rate-making body the application of this standard according to the facts.

"I do not believe that there can be successful regulation of the railroad industry without a basis for mutual understanding between those representing the public, labor, and the owners, respectively. In the past there has been no basis for understanding except at the end of dispute and controversy. Each of the three great interests has worked, to a large extent, entirely aloof from the other two.

"Yet the railroad enterprise is a great common enterprise. It can not be conducted without the exercise of the most vital public franchises; nor can it be conducted without the participation of a large body of skilled labor which makes a life career out of railroad employment; nor can it be conducted without the physical property which has been created by the investment of capital. We make a grave mistake in assuming that the representatives of capital can alone manage the situation. The scheme of the past has been on that false theory and the result has been that the public has injected itself into the management through all sorts of agencies and labor has injected itself into the management through its own organizations, not only through direct demands upon railroad companies but through demands on Congress and on State legislatures and public commissions for legislation and regulations affecting management. We have all three interests participating in the management in all sorts of ways and yet there is no common ground on which these three elements can meet and exchange views and endeavor to reach conclusions. I believe the only sort of management which can be permanently effective is one which provides for an orderly participation at the outset of all three of these interests instead of the past scheme which leaves each interest to pursue its own methods irrespective of the others until an eventual contact is established in some form of controversy.

"The fact is that in the past these two essential elements of the public and of labor have asserted their participation only through some form of controversy. The public side of it is asserted through hearings by legislative bodies or by commissions and these hearings nearly always take on a controversial aspect and the result is that the railroad business is largely conducted through a series of lawsuits.

"The labor side of the matter generally manifests itself in an even more controversial spirit.

"In my opinion there must be a form of participation in the management from the outset which will give each interest to start with an understanding of the reasonable needs and expectations of the other two interests. Out of this community of understanding I believe there will be evolved a much more successful disposition than will otherwise be possible.

"But beyond the mere matter of understanding it will be of vast importance to put on the public representatives and on the labor representatives a direct sense of responsibility for the rendition of the public service. This can not possibly satisfactorily or completely arise out of the old system and I do not see how it can be attained, except by participation in management which I suggest.

"When Federal control began there had come to be a vivid realization of the great embarrassments to which a railroad company was subjected by reason of having to engage in the paradoxical practice of running down its credit in order to sustain it. A railroad company could not secure consideration for what it regarded as a necessary rate increase without painting an alarming picture of the critical situation which confronted it unless it got a rate increase. This was necessary because the rate-making tribunal had no first-hand information derived from immediate contact and a direct sense of responsibility for railroad management. The rate-making body approached the matter entirely in an attitude of skepticism. In order to overcome this attitude the railroad company had to stress all the difficulties of its situation and frequently was rebuked by the rate-making body for discrediting its credit at the very time it was trying to improve it. Yet I believe this result was inevitable under the old system and we will soon see precisely the same condition repeated if this feature of the old system shall remain in operation. The only way to avoid it is through some radical reconstruction of the management which will bring the public representatives into a direct understanding and also into a direct and original responsibility for the conduct of the business. Unless this can be done I believe it is only a question of time when the remaining vestiges of private management will come to be recognized as altogether impracticable.

"I do not believe that any form of railroad operation can permanently succeed in this country when conducted through so many different railroad managements as at present. The public interest involved is almost completely homogeneous because from one end of the country to the other the public wants adequate service and a complete interchange of equipment in order to obtain that service and, of course, enjoy uniform rates regardless of the railroad on which the traffic is carried. The labor interest involved was largely homogeneous before the war and is almost completely so at present. We can not therefore hope to succeed with a heterogeneous lot of railroad managements, over 100 in number with perhaps at least 50 of a dominant character. These numerous managements will constantly embarrass each other in many ways. The great variations of prosperity and adversity will completely baffle people trying to understand the real facts as to the needs of the railroads. I believe that it will be essential to consolidate the railroads through some compulsory process into a few great corporations upon the managements of which the public and labor will be adequately represented.

"I know the argument is urged that this will be difficult to accomplish but I have not the slightest doubt that it can be accomplished if the public realizes the necessity for it, and I am convinced that it is an absolutely necessary step if Government ownership is to be permanently avoided.

"I am also aware that the suggestion has been made that these consolidations should come about gradually by voluntary action, but my observation of the unsatisfactory results of the old scheme of public regulation and private management are that this situation will not wait for a gradual process of voluntary consolidation. I believe that either this matter must be dealt with in a comprehensive and effective compulsory way or that any scheme of legislation adopted will prove itself a disappointment and a failure long before voluntary consolidations can be worked out.

"To recapitulate my views on a permanent solution of the railroad problem, I believe that there must be fundamental changes which will consolidate the railroads into a few great systems. I believe that the public and labor, as well as capital, must be represented upon the managements of these systems. I believe that a definite standard for rates must be established and that earnings clearly in excess of a reasonable return must be divided and must go largely to providing adequate reserves to take care of years of depression, and at the same time enough of the excess must be left with the company earning it to provide adequate stimulus for efficiency. In my opinion, if any effort be made to return the railroads to private control without the fundamental reconstruction which I advise, the result will be progressively disappointing, and in a few years the dissatisfaction of the public will manifest itself through an insistent demand for a radically different plan which is not likely then to stop short of outright Government ownership.

"The argument has been urged in response to such fundamental changes that we ought not to adopt an untried system but ought to retain the system of the past with which we are familiar, but it is the very fact of our familiarity with the system of the past which compels me to believe that there must be complete departure from that system. I believe our past experience has demonstrated that the old system will not succeed. It certainly is a poor argument to insist that we should adhere to a failure as a permanent policy simply because we are familiar with it.

"Turning to another highly important aspect of this general problem, I wish to point out the unusual difficulties which attend the immediate establishment of any plan of private management with adequate credit to provide the necessary capital needed for railroad development. These obstacles are not only embarrassing to railroad credit, but they also involve serious elements of injury to the public transportation service.

"I believe there will be general agreement that this is one of the most difficult financial periods in the history of the country or the world. Obviously it will be more difficult to establish satisfactorily the credit of a large number of railroad companies at the present moment than it would be to do this at a later date when financial conditions generally have become better stabilized.

"Railroad credit is dependent, of course, upon the conclusion which the investing public reach as to the earning capacity of the railroads. Necessarily these conclusions must be based upon past experience. The war and the conditions of unrest growing out of the war have created conditions which greatly impair the value of recent experience in railroad operations as a basis for forming conclusions as to actual earning capacity. No one would seriously contend that the year 1918 furnished a satisfactory basis for concluding what the railroads could earn on the basis of a given rate level, but as a matter of fact the year 1919 is going to be equally unreliable and probably more so. In the first six months of 1919 there was a sudden, abnormally heavy, and abnormally prolonged slump in freight traffic, at a time when the railroad operating machinery was just being readjusted from the war basis. The heavy deficits incurred during the first six months were due largely, if not almost wholly, to this condition. The next four months, from July to October, 1919, represented fairly normal conditions of reasonably heavy business, and in those months under unified operation the results were such that a very small increase in rates would have avoided any deficit. The months of November and December will be useless for comparative purposes, because they will be exceedingly costly by reason of the coal strike, which created an industrial condition unprecedented in this country and which imposed enormous unavoidable costs on railroad operation.

"With such conditions, it is evident that those opposed to rate increases can find innumerable plausible arguments in favor of small increases, and those in favor of large increases can support them by correspondingly numerous and plausible arguments. It is also evident that railroad investors will view with alarm the heavy deficits of the past and probably will not be reassured without substantial increases. There probably could not be a more difficult time in which to readjust rates so as to reassure the railroad investor and at the same time reasonably protect the public.

"By reason of this condition, the public interest is confronted with a serious dilemma. How can it at the present moment make rates high enough to constitute adequate reassurance to railroad credit without at the same time making them much higher than would likely turn out to be necessary if the period of readjustment could be postponed until a time of more stable conditions. Undoubtedly if the policy be adopted of establishing independent railroad credit instantly at all hazards it would be only logical to make the rate increases large enough to do so.

"There may easily arise out of these perplexities a situation which will fall short of what the railroad investor has been led to expect, and which consequently will not stimulate sufficient confidence in railroad credit.

"On one point I believe there must be agreement, and that is that any rate increase which will at all establish an adequate credit for the various railroad companies operating independently on their own responsibility must be substantially greater than a rate increase which would protect the situation temporarily if unified control were continued until more stable conditions appear. This means that the public must pay a very substantial price in an additional increase in rates for the privilege of the immediate resumption of private management.

"Again it is clear that it will not be possible for the railroad companies to make satisfactory financial plans on the basis of the legislation now in prospect in time to commit themselves definitely to large orders for necessary equipment so as to meet the heavy requirements of next fall. For months I have been pointing out that under existing conditions the Railroad Administration could not order and agree to pay for this equipment, and that therefore it could only be provided soon enough by immediately enabling the railroad companies to do so, so the prospects for getting it in time for next fall have largely disappeared. I believe it will be generally conceded that under Federal control the unification of control has made the existing equipment go further and produce a greater volume of transportation than would be possible under the old form of private managements. If, therefore, private management is resumed at a time when it will be impossible to secure the additional equipment necessary to admit of the numerous private managements giving a corresponding total of transportation service, it is evident that the public will pay an additional price through increased shortages in transportation in the next period of heavy business.

"When I appeared before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce last February, I pointed out the difficulties in the way of a transfer back to private management during the period of readjustment and expressed the opinion that the public would be better served and with less cost, and railroad investors would be better protected, to continue the present Federal operation long enough to tide over the readjustment period, and also to admit of legislation with greater deliberation after the beginning of the next presidential term. The Congress, however, has from the time of the first proposal of this plan appeared to be averse to any procedure other than the adoption at the earliest possible moment of general legislation and the turning back of the railroads to private management under such legislation. Since it would be out of the question for Federal control to be successful without the support of Congress, the necessary steps have been taken in accordance with the sentiment and purpose of Congress for the turning back of the railroads on March 1.

"In this connection let me say that despite the widespread fashion of criticizing Federal control of railroads and attributing to it practically every condition that grew out of the war, my deliberate judgment is that Federal control has rendered some very important public services which far outweigh any defects with which it may be chargeable. For one thing, it protected railroad credit through a period of most critical financial difficulty. When we consider on the one hand the precarious situation of public utilities in many parts of the country, and on the other hand the results which the railroad properties have enjoyed during Federal control, it must be clear that a highly important service has been rendered in the protection of investment in railroad property and of the due returns therefrom. Equally important results have been obtained from the standpoint of the general public. In a time of great difficulty and with an amount of equipment which was inadequate even before Federal control began, the unified operation of the railroads has produced a total transportation service greater than ever before in the history of the country, and has done it with far less congestion and delay than was characteristic of conditions of heavy business under private control. Generally speaking, the period of heaviest business is in the fall months. In these months both in 1918 and in 1919 the business was heavier than in any corresponding periods prior to the war. A greater volume of traffic was moved and with far less congestion than was characteristic of the conditions of private management. I know on several occasions in the fall months prior to Federal control the state of traffic congestion in some parts of the country reached such a state as to constitute a transportation crisis, but these conditions were obviated through the use of the opportunities which came from unified control. I attribute the achievement entirely to the opportunities which unified control gave and not to any superior wisdom which I claim was possessed by the Railroad Administration.

"I want to emphasize the point that the railroads were placed under Government control during the war, and that the predominant motive during the war was the prompt movement of troops and war supplies. From January 1, 1918, to November 1, 1919, there were 13,446,859 soldiers, sailors, and marines moved on the railroads in the United States, and this was equivalent to transporting one passenger 5,917,658,719 miles, thus necessitating the use of 213,749 railroad coaches and Pullmans and the movement of over 18,000 special trains. The civilian inconveniences which have been dwelt upon so consistently resulted in a very large measure from the primacy which had to be given to this war object.

"The fact that there has been a deficit from railroad operations under Federal control has been regarded by many as conclusive evidence of the necessity for a precipitate return to private control, but the fact is that the deficit has not been due to excessive costs. The costs have not been relatively greater than in other lines of enterprise. The real reason for the deficit is due to the fact that the prices charged for railroad transportation have not been increased in keeping with the increases in prices of commodities. For the first six months of Federal control there was no increase initiated by the director general in the rates of transportation. If the increases in rates which were put into effect by him in the latter part of June, 1918, had been put into effect on January 1, 1918, at the very beginning of Federal control, the class 1 railroads would have shown a profit of about $14,000,000 at the end of October, 1919, at the expiration of 22 months of Federal control, instead of a deficit of nearly $500,000,000. In other words, the deficit can fairly be said to have been due to the fact that the increase in rates was necessarily deferred six months. The entire deficit for the period from January, 1918, to October, 1919, both inclusive, for class 1 railroads and large terminal companies in Federal operation was $480,000,000, but if the rate increases made in June, 1918, had been effective January 1, 1918, from which time, of course, the increased expenses were largely effective, the additional revenue without any increase in operating expenses would have been $494,000,000, thus more than offsetting the deficit and leaving a profit of $14,000,000.

"If the Railroad Administration had increased its rates 50 or 60 per cent, which was less than the increase in prices by private industries throughout the country, and which, by the way, appears to be in line with the increases in rates now being proposed for railroads in England and in other European countries, handsome profits would have been shown instead of a deficit.

"The indications are that despite all the increases in cost which have been incurred by the Railroad Administration, a continuance of unified control could be made self-supporting upon a very small increase in rates, whereas a return to private management with the necessity of establishing the credit of a great number of independent railroad companies, would undoubtedly call for a much greater increase in rates if the railroad credit is in fact to be successfully established.

"While on the subject of results of the Railroad Administration, I wish to correct the radically erroneous impression as to the treatment of labor. The increase in the rates of pay to railroad labor have by no means been out of line with the increases to labor in private enterprises, and in both instances the increases have been due to the conditions created by the war. It is a curious illustration of the aberration of the times that the increase in wages made by the Railroad Administration is regarded as a proof of politics and inefficiency, while an even greater increase in some of the important industrial enterprises of the country is regarded as a perfectly natural response to business necessities.

"Special stress has been laid by some of the critics of the Railroad Administration upon the increase in the number of employees. This increase is principally accounted for by the establishment of the 8-hour day and involves no increase in the number of hours of labor paid for. Obviously if 80 hours of labor are to be done 10 employees will be required on the basis of an 8-hour day as compared with only 8 on the basis of a 10-hour day, and yet only 80 hours will be paid for in either case. To a considerable extent it is undoubtedly true that the larger number of employees has been due to the loss of experienced employees on account of the war and to the exceptional turnover of employees, which has been a natural characteristic of the industrial change and unrest. In these respects the Railroad Administration does not differ from other industrial enterprises. It is important to bear in mind that the number of hours of work paid for is in the control of the experienced railroad officers as far as it can be controlled in view of general industrial conditions. The central administration is constantly checking up this situation and bringing to the attention of local officers any cases which arise and which indicate the payment for unnecessary hours of work. The influence of the central administration, therefore, is consistently exercised in favor of a reduction in the hours of work paid for rather than in favor of an increase in the hours of work paid for.

"Let me at this point digress to say that there has never been any selection of either officers or employees in the Railroad Administration for political reasons, and that the assumption which is sometimes indulged that governmental activities create unnecessary positions for political reasons is absolutely without any foundation as far as the Railroad Administration is concerned. I do not believe there is a single officer of the Railroad Administration who has sought his position. It is strikingly an institution where the office has sought the man. There has never been any inquiry into the politics of an officer, and, as a rule, I am not advised as to the politics of the members of my staff or their subordinates or as to the politics of the officers on the various railroads or their subordinates. Let me emphasize also that throughout Federal control railroad operation has been in the hands of skilled railroad officers who have spent their lives in railroad service, and, generally speaking, has been in the hands of the very same officers who conducted the same operations prior to Federal control and will continue to conduct them after Federal control.

"Returning to the results of railroad operation under Federal control, let me emphasize that the striking respect in which private enterprise has been more effective than the Railroad Administration is that the private enterprise has been so much more efficient in raising the prices which have been imposed upon the public, while the Railroad Administration has endeavored to protect the public and the business of the country from any unnecessary increases in the level of the railroad rate structure. Conditions in the early part of 1919 were so abnormal and unprecedented as to preclude any satisfactory and reliable readjustment of rates. It is thoroughly appreciated that the unfavorable return in the early months of 1919 was very largely, if not almost wholly, due to the abnormal slump in business. If an increase had then been made to produce the profits on the abnormally small business, I am satisfied the step would have been exceedingly unjust to the public. The result in the fairly normal months of July to October clearly justified this prudent policy, because they indicated that in any normal volume of business the rate increase necessary under unified control would have been very much less than was indicated by the abnormal months preceding. The entire increase in rates since 1914 has been on an average for the country only about 33 per cent. In that time the increase in prices of the articles transported has varied from 60 per cent and 80 per cent up to 150 per cent.

"Let me in conclusion again remind you of the conditions which prevailed in 1917. We get no clearer or more striking picture of these conditions than that which was presented by the executives of the eastern railroads to the Interstate Commerce Commission in the late fall of 1917 in behalf of the effort then made to secure an increase in rates. The conditions were then summed up on behalf of the railroad interests as follows:

"(a) Continuous increases in the cost of labor, fuel, supplies, taxes, and of obtaining new capital.

"(b) Inability to secure and retain efficient labor.

"(c) Curtailment of maintenance expenses, which curtailment is due in part to inability to secure necessary labor and materials.

"(d) Decrease in net operating income, notwithstanding large increase in operating revenues, in property investment, in carload, and in trainload.

"(e) Reduction in surplus with consequent effect upon the credit of the carriers.

"(f) Inability to secure new capital by the issue of stock, with the consequent weakening effect upon the financial structure.

"(g) Inability to provide improvements and facilities, not only essential for the traffic of to-day, but equally essential for the traffic of the future.

"Let us not forget that conditions of this character were the outgrowth of the imperfect system of management and regulation which existed at that time, and let us take the lesson to heart in considering whether there must not be a fundamental reconstruction of the scheme of management and regulation if any of the useful features of private control are to be reestablished with any reasonable hope of their being permanently successful."

The Fuller Civil War Pension Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST R. ACKERMAN,

OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me peculiarly fitting at this time, when another year has dawned, that we should look around us and, while considering the budget for the year to come, to give more than a passing thought to those who when the country's life was in danger a half century ago sprang into the breach and saved the Union from being dismembered.

On every side we hear the plea for economy, and it must not be disregarded. War is frightful, and its aftermath a thing too horrible for calm consideration. Prodigality and excesses of every sort follow in war's train, and saneness, efficiency, and economy seem to have left the reason of those who survive. Pledged as we are to be economical, we would be equally recreant to our trust if we became parsimonious.

The pension bill now before us is to alleviate—unfortunately it can do so in part only—the wants, the sufferings, and the privations of those who in the Nation's hour of trial responded to the call of duty in its behalf.

Of course, we must economize where waste can be shown to exist. There is no excuse for waste, no matter what is the amount of the revenue, but this country would not have been in the position it was in 1917 if the soldier boys who fought at Antietam, Gettysburg, and at other points too numerous to mention had not preserved the Union to posterity "an undivided and indissoluble Nation," stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico.

The Bible says, "There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty."

Reduced to cold and unsympathetic figures, what does this additional pension bill mean? It means a tax of less than 2 cents a week for the next fiscal year upon all those residing in the continental United States. That is all it means. A postage stamp from each of us weekly to allay the want of those who bore the heat and burden of the day. A little calculation will convince you of the soundness of my reasoning.

Where is the man, or the woman either, who would not give a year's contribution many times over if one of these deserving individuals should make a personal appeal for assistance? How long would the consideration of such an expenditure deter one from going to the "movies" or some other form of entertainment? Not a minute.

The collective wealth of the Nation, not less than $350,000,000,000, and probably exceeding that by some 50 per cent, according to some calculations I have seen, is a warrant that we have not yielded to anything beyond our resources.

True, the number affected by this pension increase is less than 1 per cent of our population, but, in my opinion, this country would never have become the mighty beehive of activity that it is, and which it promises to remain, if those who are the recipients of this just provision had not left the plowshare and the countingroom in the early sixties and successfully braved the fire and the tempest then raging.

Mr. Speaker, as a business man for 40 years and covering a wide range of competitive activities, I am not unmindful of the provisions that are being made in all lines of business to provide for those who have not even reached the Psalmist span of threescore and ten. Why, therefore, is it not fitting and proper that these defenders of the Nation, whose ages are nearly all in excess of that figure, receive just consideration at our hands?

Those who fought in the War of the Rebellion were not so fortunate as those of our countrymen who fought for civilization in the late terrific conflict. In the Civil War no adequate system of insurance had been devised. The times were not ripe for that advanced thought in their behalf. Nor had the Red Cross begun to function so effectively. Welfare work was undreamed of. The boys of 1861 generally endured privations which not many of our khaki-clad youths of yesterday had to face.

No training camps to adequately drill them were projected and medical science had not progressed to the point where the knife and saw were not supreme when the wounded were brought in.

No Vocational Board of Education stood ready to hold out a helping hand when the maimed and crippled soldier received his honorable discharge, saying to him, "We will pay you a liberal weekly sum even while you are learning the trade of your own choosing, which in the near future will bring you in an adequate income."

The march to the grave for the remnant that is left is being accelerated with lightning speed. Since the bill was considered in the committee competent judges tell us that over 10,000 of these veterans have passed to their reward.

Every 10 minutes of the day and night one of these recipients of the Government's care passes over "the great divide." Before to-morrow's sun shall shine a half hundred more will be where no pension can do anything for them. If two months' time elapses before the measure becomes law several thousand will be beyond the pale. None of us want them to pass their remaining days, which to the entire number can not be many, like "galley slaves scourged to a dungeon," but would prefer that their last hours be soothed by the thought that a great Nation, now the repository of the world's treasures, had lightened their burdens so that when the "summons comes to join that great caravan" they can "wrap the draperies of their couch about them and lie down to pleasant dreams."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENJAMIN F. WELTY,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 9367) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted I beg to say that when the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions notified me, during the holidays, that the bill now pending would be called up for consideration to-day I made a special effort to be here for the purpose of supporting this bill, providing for an increase of pension to our soldiers. I am in favor of this bill because a great many of the veterans of the Civil War, with their widows and children, are needy and deserve this additional compensation. Objections have been made because this will mean an additional drain on the Public Treasury of some $65,000,000, but when I think of the increased cost of living and remember the many letters from these old veterans, many dependent upon friends and charity for support, I concluded to support this bill granting an additional increase in order that they might be able to pay for the necessaries of life during their declining days without depending upon charity.

I have been interested in these veterans from the time I was able to read the history that they had written in blood, and it was they who inspired me to join a military company the first opportunity I had after entering school. It was they who inspired me to leave my position as city solicitor and volunteer my services as private during the Spanish-American War. It was the glorious history that these boys made during the Civil War that made me chafe during the Sixty-fifth Congress because my services were thrice denied in a military capacity because I was a Member of Congress.

I am not going to vote for this bill as a matter of charity, but because these veterans created a national obligation through their services, which obligation the Nation will never be able to pay. I am not going to support this bill with a hope that this pension, or any other pension that we might grant, will be able to pay for the sacrifices that these soldiers made. I would not for one minute take any of their glory away by attempting to pay for their services. Sacrifices can never be paid for without destroying the pleasure of making them. These boys made the sacrifice without any hope of reward in dollars and cents. The reward that is theirs must be a deep satisfaction to them for having done their duty at a time when this country was in danger. They did not then ask the cost, but were willing to do their full duty, even though it cost their life. What a glorious heritage these brave lads have in the memory of their declining days, and what satisfaction must come to them when they think that there was a time in their life when opportunity knocked at their door giving them permission to make the sacrifice to preserve the Union. This sacrifice can neither be purchased nor compensated.

A few days ago we made provisions for the disabled soldiers of the World War, which will be an additional drain on the Treasury of approximately $80,000,000. When these boys gave their services they did not know what provisions would be made if they should become disabled, but they had reasons to believe that they were fighting for a grateful people and that this country would take care of them in the event they were disabled.

I was hoping that the bill providing for pension of disabled soldiers of the Spanish-American War would receive consideration at the same time this bill was called up. These boys of the Spanish-American War seemingly have been overlooked. Their widows never received any consideration until the Sixty-fifth Congress. All these years they were required to depend upon their own efforts and charity to provide the necessaries of life for themselves and children. I do hope that Congress will grant some relief to the disabled soldiers of the Spanish-American War, for a nation can not live long unless it is willing to make provisions for the support of those who were injured in order to preserve that nation.

There are those who believe that these heavy drains should not be made on the Treasury at this time because of the indebtedness incurred during the war, but some one must care for those who became disabled while fighting to preserve us a Nation.

Silver Star Awards for Gallantry.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. SUMMERS,

OF WASHINGTON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the Army bill of 1918 not only appropriated funds for the Army but provided suitable decorations for our distinguished soldiers both in America and overseas.

MEDAL OF HONOR.

The law provided—

That the President is authorized to present, in the name of the Congress, a medal of honor only to each person who, while an officer or enlisted man of the Army, shall hereafter, in action involving actual conflict with an enemy, distingush himself conspicuously by gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of his life above and beyond the call of duty.

DISTINGUISHED SERVICE CROSS.

That—

The President be, and he is hereby, further authorized to present, but not in the name of Congress, a distinguished service cross of appropriate design and a ribbon, together with a rosette or other device, to be worn in lieu thereof, to any person who, while serving in any capacity with the Army of the United States since the 6th day of April, 1917, has distinguished, or who shall hereafter distinguish himself or herself by extraordinary heroism in connection with military operations against an armed enemy.

DISTINGUISHED-SERVICE MEDAL.

That—

The President be, and he is hereby, further authorized to present, but not in the name of Congress, a distinguished-service medal of appropriate design and a ribbon, together with a rosette or other device, to be worn in lieu thereof, to any person who, while serving in any capacity with the Army of the United States since the 6th day of April, 1917, has distinguished, or who hereafter shall distinguish, himself or herself by exceptionally meritorious service to the Government in a duty of great responsibility; and said distinguished-service medal shall also be issued to all enlisted men of the Army to whom the certificate of merit has been granted up to and including the date of the passage of this act under the provisions of previously existing law, in lieu of such certificate of merit, and after the passage of this act the award of the certificate of merit for distinguished service shall cease; and additional pay heretofore authorized by law for holders of the certificate of merit shall not be paid to them beyond the date of the award of the distinguished-service medal in lieu theref as aforesaid.

SILVER STAR.

When it came to other citations of an officer or of an enlisted man not warranting the award of the medal of honor the distinguished-service cross, or the distinguished-service medal, the law provided that a silver star should be awarded on a citation "published in orders issued from the headquarters of a force commanded by a general officer."

Under this law many men cited for bravery and heroism would be deprived of an honor which they earned in most cases in the face of the enemy, merely because their brigade was not commanded by a brigadier general or some other officer of higher rank.

I cite the case of the Sixty-sixth Field Artillery Brigade, composed of the One hundred and forty-sixth and the One hundred and forty-eighth Field Artillery Regiments, which was always commanded while in action by a colonel.

One battalion of this brigade was recruited by Col. Paul H. Weyrauch from my district, in southeastern Washington. They were my friends and neighbors, and no braver, more loyal, or more patriotic sons of America ever faced the enemy on Flanders field than were these sons of the great Northwest.

Others in the brigade came from Oregon, Idaho, Wyoming, New Mexico, and Colorado, and brave men were they all.

No greater pleasure has come to me as a Member of Congress than the preparation and the fathering of the bill now under consideration, which authorizes the bestowal of the silver star and the honor and distinction attendant therewith upon some 50 or more of these gallant heroes of the late war.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

It is a matter of personal regret that I have not the records before me from which to quote the citations of them all. However, among the many recommendations for citations I am now able to quote several. Some of these have been recommended for the distinguished-service cross. All are recommended for the silver star. Whether or not the citations will finally be made in all cases I can not say.

Some of the bravest now sleep in far-away France, but the honor is theirs and the decoration should go to their loved ones.

I invite your attention to these recommendations:

CAPT. WILLIAM S. PETTIT, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

Capt. Pettit was in command of the Second Battalion of this regiment from July 9, 1918, until he was evacuated to a hospital on November 3, 1918.

He was a most excellent battalion commander. He was always ready for any service, however arduous. During his last few days in command of the battalion his battalion P. C., near Romagne, France, was daily subjected to heavy enemy fire. During the night of November 2–3, 1918, it became necessary for him to twice change the location of his P. C. owing to heavy shelling. Although sick and worn out, he stuck to his post until directed by the regimental commander to go to a hospital for examination.

He died on November 8, 1918.

FIRST LIEUT. WALTER C. LEE, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

Lieut. Lee was on duty as orienteur officer of the Second Battalion during the four campaigns in which the regiment was engaged. Although very much run down and quite ill during the early days of November, he remained on duty with his battalion, performing most valuable service as adjutant, orienteur officer, and operations officer. He remained at his post until his illness compelled the surgeon to send him to a hospital in the rear.

He died on November 16, 1918.

FIRST LIEUT. WADE G. WAILES, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

About 6.30 p. m. on the night of October 26, 1918, near Cunel, France, during a very intense and severe artillery concentration by the enemy, Lieut. Wailes went to the rescue of Corp. Clarence F. Holland, Battery C, One hundred and forty-sixth Field Artillery, who had been mortally wounded, and remained with and attended to this wounded man throughout the entire concentration.

Lieut. Wailes showed indifference to all danger, disregarding all thought of personal safety, although shells were bursting within 25 feet on all sides.

SECOND CLASS MUSICIAN ASHER S. BRADLEY, HEADQUARTERS COMPANY, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

On August 12, 1918, at Chery-Chartreuse, France, Musician Bradley aided in establishing and maintaining liaison between aviators and brigade headquarters radio station during an adjustment of fire, by moving the radio truck, after the truck had been hit, to a new position, and while still under fire aided in putting up the antennae and manning the panels.

PVT. CLAUDE E. WAGNER, MEDICAL DETACHMENT, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

At about 6.30 p. m., October 26, 1918, near Cunel, France, during a very intense and severe artillery concentration by the enemy, Pvt. Wagner went to the rescue of Corpl. Clarence F. Holland, who had been mortally wounded, and remained and cared for Corpl. Holland during the entire concentration.

Pvt. Wagner showed indifference to all danger, disregarding all thought of personal safety, although shells were bursting all around him and as close as 25 feet.

PVT. HOWARD L. HUNT, BATTERY C, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

At about 6.30 p. m., October 26, 1918, near Cunel, France, during a very intense and severe artillery concentration by the enemy, Pvt. Hunt went to the rescue of Corpl. Clarence F. Holland, who had been mortally wounded, and remained and cared for Corpl. Holland during the entire concentration.

Pvt. Hunt showed indifference to all danger, disregarding all thought of personal safety, although shells were bursting all around him and as close as 25 feet.

PVT. CLARENCE O. HARBERT, BATTERY C, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

At about 6.30 p. m., October 26, 1918, near Cunel, France, during a very intense and severe artillery concentration by the enemy, Pvt. Harbert went to the rescue of Corpl. Clarence F. Holland, who had been mortally wounded, and remained and cared for Corpl. Holland during the entire concentration.

Pvt. Harbert showed indifference to all danger, disregarding all thought of personal safety, although shells were bursting all around him and as close as 25 feet.

CORPL. JOHN M. LIEDTKE, BATTERY F, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

While his battery was in position at Cuisy, France, on October 5, 1918, Corpl. Liedtke extinguished a fire in a large ammunition dump located near the battery. The dump was under heavy enemy shell fire and was set on fire. Disregarding all personal danger, Corpl. Liedtke went into the dump and extinguished the fire, which was rapidly spreading among the camouflage and powder boxes. The dump was on fire at several places, caused by powder boxes and boxes of 75-mm. shells exploding.

CORPL. PETER A. BERGQUIST, BATTERY F, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

While his battery was in position at Cuisy, France, on October 5, 1918, Corpl. Bergquist, at the risk of his own life, extinguished a fire which was destroying powder at the battery ammunition dump. This fire was caused by enemy shell fire, and during the whole performance the dump was under heavy fire by the enemy.

SERGT. FLOYD C. LINDER, HEADQUARTERS COMPANY, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

On November 8, 1918, at Montigny, France, Sergt. Linder kept up the telephone communication between the different units of the regiment while the city of Montigny was under heavy shell fire until this became impossible.

Sergt. Linder also voluntarily remained at the switchboard at the regimental post of command at Montigny during heavy shell fire. During all this time he exhibited great coolness and courage.

PVT. RAY BROWN, HEADQUARTERS COMPANY, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

Pvt. Brown on numerous occasions, while on duty as courier at the regimental post of command, displayed remarkable courage and coolness under fire while delivering messages to the different units of the regiment. On many occasions he volunteered for this service.

This soldier was evacuated to the hospital, returned to the United States, and has since been discharged from the service.

FIRST-CLASS PVT. JACQUES M. SILK-DOWNS, HEADQUARTERS COMPANY, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

On September 26, 1918, at Germanville, Pvt. Silk-Downs assisted in caring for a number of wounded infantrymen during heavy enemy shelling. During the shelling 15 men were killed and about 40 wounded. Although these men did not belong to his own organization, Pvt. Silk-Downs voluntarily left his dugout and carried a number of the wounded men to safety under fire and assisted in caring for them.

This soldier was later evacuated to a hospital, returned to the United States, and has since been discharged from the service.

REGIMENTAL SUPPLY SERGT. JOHN H. PENNINGTON, SUPPLY COMPANY, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

Sergt. Pennington performed most meritorious service supplying the batteries of the First Battalion, One hundred and forty-sixth Field Artillery, with rations during the time the batteries of that battalion were under fire.

Sergt. Pennington is also deserving of mention because of his unfailing energy and endeavor to perform his duties as regimental supply sergeant under the most varied and trying circumstances.

PVT. FRANK J. STARR, MEDICAL DETACHMENT, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

On October 31, 1918, at Romagne, France, Pvt. Starr assisted in the care of men wounded by heavy enemy shelling. While so engaged he was instantly killed by a shell fragment. On the preceding day he had also assisted in the dressing of a severely wounded soldier injured by shell fire.

CORPL. WILLIAM H. BRIGGS, BATTERY A, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

While his battery was in position at Lhuys, France, July 30 to August 6, 1918, telephone communication was frequently destroyed by enemy shelling. Disregarding his personal safety, and on several occasions in spite of extreme darkness, Corpl. Briggs repeatedly went out alone through heavy shelling in order to reestablish communication.

PVT. MARVIN C. SHAHA, BATTERY A, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

On several occasions, while his battery was in position at Villeneuve, France, and at Lhuys, France, from July 30 to August 6, 1918, telephone communications were frequently destroyed during the night. Pvt. Shaha repeatedly went out alone under heavy shell fire, searching for wire trouble, in spite of extreme darkness, and disregarding his personal safety he continued this work until he had succeeded in reestablishing communication.

CORPL. WENDELL W. MORRISON, BATTERY E, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

While his battery was in action near Natillois, France, on October 30–31, 1918, Corpl. Morrison, under continued shell fire, kept communication lines repaired which were being repeatedly cut, thus making possible efficient fire of the battery.

Corpl. Morrison was in charge of the telephone detail, of which detail three men were wounded. Corpl. Morrison carried one of these wounded men, Pvt. Waters, to a dressing station under heavy shell fire and returned to his post.

PVT. ALEX LUCAS, BATTERY E, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

Pvt. Lucas, while a member of a telephone detail on duty with his battery near Nantillois, France, on October 30 and 31, 1918, assisted in keeping communication lines repaired which were being repeatedly cut. Although wounded in two places, Pvt. Lucas refused to be sent to the rear and remained on duty through the night, almost constantly under fire.

MAJ. JAMES C. HAMILTON, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

On the morning of November 8, 1918, while the First and Second Battalions of this regiment were stationed at Montigny, France, the place was heavily shelled. The regimental commander directed Maj. Hamilton to get the men into a place of safety. Maj. Hamilton performed his duty regardless of personal danger, and afterwards voluntarily remained with the regimental commander at the regimental post of command until our own artillery fire had opened on the enemy batteries. During all this time Montigny was being heavily shelled with 77 mm., 150 mm., and 210 mm.

FIRST LIEUT. A. C. LANGDON, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

On the night of August 11, 1918, while the First Battalion was preparing to move from its position at Lhuys, France, hostile fire was adjusted on the town by enemy planes. At 11.30 p. m. one of the shells struck in front of the battalion post of command, injuring Wagoner Flynn and Regimental Supply Sergt. Pennington, also destroying a Ford car and setting fire to two trucks. Lieut. Langdon personally put out the fire and directed the removal of the injured, disregarding his personal safety during the shelling.

On November 9, 1918, while the battalion was stationed at Montigny, France, Lieut. Langdon volunteered to examine a dam placed across the Meuse at Stenay by the enemy, in order to inundate the surrounding country. While examining this dam he braved intense artillery and machine-gun fire, but he carried out his mission and returned with the required information.

CAPT. FRANK R. JEFFREY, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY, REGIMENTAL ADJUTANT (NOW MAJOR, FIELD ARTILLERY).

While on duty as supply officer, Third Battalion, of this regiment, Capt. Jeffrey distinguished himself by performing most meritorious service through his watchfulness in keeping his battalion well supplied at all times.

While in temporary command of the Third Battalion, near Cuisy, France, on the night of October 4, 1918, when ordered to report to the regimental post of command, he did so report, although he had to pass through a heavy fire doing so.

During the entire Meuse-Argonne campaign he acted as chief of operations for the regiment and was indefatigable in the performance of his duties.

SERGT. GEORGE L. COX, BATTERY B, ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH FIELD ARTILLERY.

On November 8, 1918, at Montigny, France, Sergt. George L. Cox went, under shell fire, to the aid of five men from an Engineer regiment near by who were wounded by the explosion of an enemy shell. Finding two of them beyond need for help, he got the remaining three under shelter and saw that they were taken care of by first-aid men.

Sergt. Cox then went a distance of about 200 yards, under shell fire, to the aid of Pvt. Clarence Grant, Battery B, One hundred and forty-sixth Field Artillery, who was then wounded, and was instrumental in getting Pvt. Grant to the first-aid station, which was at this time under heavy enemy shell fire.

These recommendations were all made by the colonel in command of the brigade.

H. R. 10331, which I prepared and introduced on November 1, 1919, amends the old law and reads as follows:

That no more than one medal of honor or one distinguished-service cross or one distinguished-service medal shall be issued to any one person; but for each succeeding deed or act sufficient to justify the award of a medal of honor or a distinguished-service cross or a distinguished-service medal, respectively, the President may award a suitable bar or other suitable device, to be worn as he shall direct. And for each citation of an officer or enlisted man for gallantry in action, published in orders issued from the headquarters of a force commanded by, or which is the appropriate command of, a general officer, not warranting the award of a medal of honor or distinguished-service cross, he shall be permitted to wear, as the President shall direct, a silver star three-sixteenths of an inch in diameter.

The law as amended by this bill will permit the award of the silver star for gallantry in action, whether the citation was made by a brigadier general or by a colonel.

Such deeds of valor, as I have recited, should be properly recognized. No technicality of law shall stand in their way. Honor to whom honor is due. When the vote is taken, let no voice be raised against this just measure.

"A Government that Will Not Protect its Protectors and Defend its Defenders is Unworthy of the Name."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. WILL TAYLOR,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I shall cast my vote for this very meritorious measure with more than ordinary pride and pleasure, feeling as I do so that I am performing a patriotic duty and service not only to my country, but a patriotic duty and service to the rapidly decreasing remnant of that once great army of heroes that saved this Nation from the heresies of secession and preserved it for its great mission in the world's affairs.

A HISTORIC DISTRICT.

I rejoice in the fact that I represent a district that contributed more soldiers to the Union cause than any other district south of the Mason and Dixon line. One of the counties of this Gibraltar of unionism achieved the remarkable distinction of furnishing more volunteers to the Federal Army than it had voters, and this was practically true of every county in this historic district. Although environed by Confederate territory and beset by rebel influences on all sides, intrenched in their mountains as in a great fortress of freedom, they challenged the enemy with true Spartan chivalry and signally defeated every attempt to subjugate them. Situated as they were in the very heart of the Confederacy, they were forced to undergo every possible form and phase of warfare, from the savage and cowardly attack of the guerilla to the open battle field. But they endured it all with typical American bravery and devotion, and to-day no more thrilling pages are to be found in the history of our country than those which record the brilliant exploits and heroic sacrifices of the Union men of East Tennessee. If there is one thing of which I am peculiarly and preeminently proud, it is the fact that I am a son of one of these venerable old veterans. Disregarding the predilections and importunities of a father who was a staunch rebel sympathizer, my father with four of his brothers enlisted in the Union Army at the outbreak of the war and fought throughout that sanguinary struggle. And while they all came home, with one exception, unscathed, only two of them survive to-day to receive the benefits of this long-delayed recompense.

TARDY JUSTICE.

We are just beginning to do something like substantial justice by our Civil War veterans. True, it is tardy justice, because we have postponed, procrastinated, and delayed until their line has become short, thin, and wan. From a vast army of 2,128,948 sturdy, stalwart men they have dwindled and disintegrated until they now number less than 300,000 souls, old, decrepit, and emaciated. In addition to the patriotic and sentimental considerations back of this measure, an examination of the table embodied in the committee's report illustrating the advance in the cost of the necessaries of life ought to suffice to convince the most stony-hearted "watchdog" of the absolute necessity for the passage of this bill.

Other necessities in proportionate increase.

My friends, in my opinion, there is nothing too good for these old veterans of the sixties, their widows, and dependents. Under the inspired leadership of the illustrious and immortal Lincoln, they preserved the institutions of our country, and vindicated the wisdom of our fathers who laid deep and wide and eternal the foundations of this great Republic.

LIBERAL PENSION POLICY.

We can not afford to be niggard, paltry, or parsimonious in our pension policy. If our Government is long to endure, we must not show a lack of appreciation of those who suffered and sacrificed for its maintenance and perpetuity. A government that will not protect its protectors and defend its defenders is unworthy of the name, and its flag is a dirty rag that contaminates the very air in which it waves. Whenever we forget the sacrifices our soldiers have made and the suffering which they have endured; whenever we shall cease to weave garlands of glory for the living and scatter roses and lilies over the graves of those that are dead; whenever we shall fail to canonize them and provide every possible comfort for them and their dependents, then the glory will fade from our flag and liberty will perish from among us.

The fact that Uncle Sam has been liberal with his soldiers; the fact that he has always provided for those who lost their health, or otherwise became disabled, in the cause of Old Glory, and has cared for the widows and orphans of those who made the supreme sacrifice, has been the one great inspiration to the American soldier distinguishing him in point of valor and self-sacrifice in every war in our history. The certain consciousness that the Government will take care of his dependents in the event of his death or disability has inspired him to perform feats of bravery and heroism that have compelled the envy and admiration of the nations of the earth. For this Nation to take a backward step in this particular would not only be the basest sort of ingratitude but suicidal as well.

I not only favor liberal provisions for those who saw Civil War service, but the same sort of a policy should be applied to those who saw service in the Spanish-American and the World War.

AMERICAN SOLDIER.

Take the record of the American soldier, and where in the annals of any country that has lived in the "tides of time" will you find a parallel? The American soldier—how eloquent the very mention of his name! What could I say that would render his record more wonderful or unique, or that would add one leaf to the laurel that adorns his brow? The history of all of our wars is admirably illumed by the brilliancy of his bravery and by the splendor of his achievements. On more than a thousand battle fields has he gloriously demonstrated his alacrity to vindicate the cause of "Old Glory" and promote the peace, happiness, and prosperity of his country. He came from the country, from the city, from the farm, and from the factory, the flower of the land; willing, yes, glad to lay down his life for the honor and glory of his country. Whether fighting under Washington, leading the liberty-allied troops at Trenton, or under Scott, following the Eagles of France at Lundys Lane; whether under Sam Houston, crushing the armies of Santa Anna at San Jacinto, or under David Crockett, embracing death at the Alamo; whether under Lee, that great military genius of the South, valiantly struggling to stem the overwhelming tide of inexorable defeat around Richmond, or under Sherman, that great thunderbolt of war, on his renowned tour to the sea; whether storming the heights of San Juan under Roosevelt and Shafter, or bursting through the ramparts at Manila under Meritt; whether grappling with the treacherous Boxer beneath the torrid sun of China, under Chaffee, or under Fred Funston, fighting the enemies of the flag in the Philippines; whether under Admiral Fletcher charging through the streets of Vera Cruz, with their breasts bared to the shot and shell of the cowardly Mexican snipers; or whether it be our brave boys in khaki routing the bloodthirsty Hun along the Aisne and the Marne, and knocking the Hindenburg line into a "cocked hat"; wheresoever and whensoever they have fought they have exemplified to the world the fact that their enthusiasm is irresistible, their determination indomitable, and their valor sublime. Through the energy and intrepidity of our soldiers, we wrenched the scepter of tyrannical dominion from the autocratic grasp of our mother country; we achieved a free sea; we gave liberty to the Texans; we made a citizen of the black man; we disenthralled the people of Porto Rico and Cuba; we ejected the cruel Spaniard from the Philippines; and our brave sons have just returned from foreign soil where they added new chapters to the grand volume of human freedom and enriched by their brilliant achievements the military archives of the world.

FIVE TOASTS.

A story is told that some time ago in New York five gentlemen of foreign birth chanced to meet. One was a Russian, one a Turk, one a Frenchman, one an American, and the other an Englishman. These gentlemen soon became bosom friends, and finally a champagne supper was proposed, at which each gentleman, to be in keeping with the ceremonies of such an occasion, was to propose a toast to his native country, the one giving the best toast to be at no expense for the wine.

The Russian said: "Here's to the stars and bars of Russia, that were never pulled down."

The Turk: "Here's to the bird of Turkey, whose wings were never clipped."

The Frenchman: "Here's to the cock of France, whose feathers were never picked."

The American: "Here's to the Stars and Stripes of the United States of America, never trailed in defeat."

The Englishman: "Here's to the roarin', rampin' lion of Great Britain, that tore down the stars and bars of Russia, clipped the wings of Turkey, picked the feathers off the cock of France, and ran like h—— from the Stars and Stripes of the United States of America."

It is unnecessary to say that the Englishman paid for no wine.

A REUNITED COUNTRY.

I consider it a splendid omen, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, that during the debate on this bill there has been no effort to resurrect the "bloody shirt," to reopen the sores of sectionalism, or to revive its prejudices. It demonstrates that our country is in reality reunited. "Those opposed eyes which were like the meteors of a troubled horizon are now all of one nature, of one substance bred." Those vast armies that over 50 years ago met in the internecine shock and furious charge of civil strife, now in mutual well-be-seeming ranks march all one way and are no more opposed. And time with her stealing tread has plucked from memory this deep-rooted sorrow, erased the written troubles of the brain, and with some sweet, oblivious antidote cleansed, freed, and united the North and South in eternal and irrevocable truce under the shadow of the same national pride. "The grass now grows green where but a few years ago death sat on the pale horse beckoning the blue and the gray to the yawning grave, and roses now bloom where heroes once bled." The North clasps hands with the South to-day, and Yankee Doodle and Dixie blend into one national air representative of an inseparable Union. Mason and Dixon line is still extant, but it is no longer the crater of death which once swallowed up the flower of the American Republic.

"Let the silvery clarion sound the jubilee of peace. Let the welkin ring with the hallelujahs of those who wore the blue and the gray." Let them pause with uncovered heads, caress the ample folds of the gorgeous ensign of the Republic, fling it to the breezes, and sing the national hymns. It is the flag of the inseparable Union, it is the glorious symbol of that Republic whose bounds are the ocean, whose covers are the stars under which burn the perpetual flames of liberty.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT FERRIS,

OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 8, 1920.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter from Gov. J. B. A. Robertson, from my State, dealing with the question of the reorganization of the National Guard.

At the recent governors' conference, held in Utah, Gov. Robertson, with others, was named on a committee to draft and prepare necessary rules, regulations, and organization data touching the permanent organization of the National Guard.

The governor has given great attention to the subject, and is backed by Adjt. Gen. Charles F. Barrett, who has spent many toilsome years acquainting himself with the details of the National Guard in the State of Oklahoma. While our State is new and has many problems in front of it, I believe I do not say too much when I state that the question of the National Guard has been intelligently handled and effectively handled, and to that extent we are not behind the older States in the Union in the organizing and efficient handling of our National Guard. It is singularly true, and we are entitled to refer to it, that Oklahoma's National Guard leads all the rest. I mean by this that from the standpoint of efficiency and reorganization, after the world's most terrible war, it was the only State in the Union which was able to hold a Federal encampment and keep alive the embers of a National Guard organization.

The letter from the governor goes into this interesting question at length. His efforts and labor in connection therewith are well worthy of a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where others than myself may avail themselves of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter referred to follows:

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.,
January 5, 1920.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FERRIS: The organization, equipment, and training for efficient military service of a part of the able-bodied man power in each State of the Union is a prime essential in the enforcement of domestic peace and tranquillity. The vitality and strength of the constitutional provisions guaranteeing the civil rights and liberties of our citizenship depend, in the last analysis, upon the power to enforce those provisions and the laws made in pursuance thereof. Under our form of government the military power has been properly made subject to the civil power, but its functions have been clearly recognized in all our constitutions, both State and National, and laws have been framed to make that force available when needed in support of the civil authorities. The dual nature of our Government—that of a Federal Republic composed of sovereign States—demands that the military forces of a State should owe a dual allegiance, they should be qualified to serve both the State and the National Governments, and both these Governments should participate in the organization, training, and equipment of this force.

The War Department has well said: "Our Federal Constitution contemplates the use of Federal forces for local or State purposes only when all other forces of the locality or State have been exhausted or have been found insufficient to meet the emergency. The theory of our Government is opposed to the use of Federal forces except for certain specific Federal purposes. When Federal forces are used for State purposes it is an admission on the part of the State Government that they are unable to cope with the situation."

Except in time of war some form of organized militia, partially trained and equipped by the States and only incidentally aided or recognized by the Federal Government has been the reliance of the States, and it was not till the passage of legislation by Congress in 1901–1903 in aid of the organized militia that the National Guard became a potential factor in the military forces of the State and Nation. Partially equipped in most States, feebly supported by the Federal Government in all, and indifferently trained as a result, the old guard of the several States, when mobilized on the Mexican border in 1916, provided the nucleus for that grand army of triumphant crusaders for human liberty who arrived just in time on the blood-soaked battle fields of France to turn the tide of victory against the brutal German despoilers. The National Guard in Federal service in 1917–18 literally saved the day for liberty and for the world because its divisions were the only trained American forces available when the Allies with their backs to the wall sent up their Macedonian cry to the American Nation for immediate help. This is not said with the intent of making invidious comparisons between the National Guard and the Regular Army or the other splendid troops with which our military forces were expanded into the millions.

The National Guard was a going concern when war was declared. The service on the border had fitted its best units for active service anywhere as soon as proper equipment could be provided, and they were ready for this great world service when the call came. Our experience then and our need now should make it possible to organize the citizen soldiery of the country on a basis that would make the National Guard a most dependable force for the national defense and a thoroughly efficient support for the civil authorities in case of domestic violence or tumult. We do not need and the people ought not to be asked to maintain a large standing army, but we do need a Regular Army, with officers highly trained in the technique and science of military operations and requirements. Our national activities and interests will require a Regular Army in time of peace of 250,000 to 300,000 officers and men, and measures providing for such an establishment as a fundamental part of our national military system are now being favorably considered in Congress.

Under the provisions of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, provision was made for the organization, equipment, training, and service in national emergencies of the National Guard of the several States. Before this law could be put in operation the call on the old guard for service on the Mexican border was made, and from that time until the early part of 1919 the active National Guard of the several States has been in Federal service. Upon their demobilization as Federal troops the order of the War Department holding that these organizations had automatically been relieved from National Guard service when they entered the Federal service had the effect of practically wiping out the guard of the several States as it existed prior to the declaration of the war, and, except in a few of the States, or in a limited way in the majority, no real efforts have been made to reorganize the National Guard. With bills now pending before Congress to fix a permanent military policy for the Nation, it is not probable that any effective results will be obtained in the matter of National Guard reorganization until Congress has acted and the national policy has been defined. In Oklahoma an earnest effort has been made to reorganize the National Guard under the provisions of the national defense act. This reorganization was begun in 1918, when the military spirit was high but available man power limited by the draft to men exempted on account of dependents and for occupational reasons. Because of the war, equipment was almost impossible to obtain, and it was not until July, 1919, that the two regiments accepted in September, 1918, were ready for field service.

Experience with the provisions of the national-defense act as applied to the National Guard warrants the statement that with a few necessary amendments to the law and with its administration taken away from the influence and domination of the General Staff it would be an effective and practical provision for the organization and maintenance as an effective military force, available both for State and national service, of a sufficient body of high-class citizen soldiers to meet any probable emergency, either State or national. Such a force would prove the proper complement for national defense of the Regular Army and the other branches of the military service, and such a force could be maintained and made efficient at one-fourth the cost of maintaining a like number of effective troops as a purely national or standing army. This force could be organized and maintained without a provision for compulsory service and no other system can or will be.

The period of world-wide unrest which followed the Great War, and will continue to follow the necessary readjustment in industrial and other fields in our country, makes it imperative that the States shall be empowered and equipped to maintain such trained and disciplined military forces as are necessary to uphold the dignity and insure the supremacy of the civil law within their borders. An effective, practical, and properly administered National Guard system meets this requirement and provides the Federal Government with a loyal, disciplined, and ample reserve of military effectives sufficient to meet any future contingency.

The national guardsman is the ideal soldier of a Republic. He is a citizen in time of peace and a soldier in time of war, and in his volunteer service he embodies the highest example of patriotism. In domestic or State service he understands local conditions; in national service he brings to the flag the organized loyalty and devotion of his State.

There is no cause of conflict between the National Guard and the Regular Army. One is the complement of the other, and we need them both, but the administration of the National Guard calls for a bureau under the War Department that shall be free from the clannish and autocratic tyranny of the General Staff. The National Guard can never be made to fit in with a policy of militarism, for it is essentially a democratic army, and its administration calls for a broader and more intimate knowledge of the mental attitude and environment of its members than is required for the control and development of an army of professional soldiers. There should be neither partisan nor professional politics in the National Guard, and its dual allegiance to the Federal and State Governments should exactly typify the dual allegiance of the good citizen of every State who loves his State and Nation with a fervent and undivided loyalty.

It is hardly necessary to assert that the people of Oklahoma in an overwhelming majority are opposed to any military policy or system which will provide except in time of great emergency for compulsory military service, whether universal or limited. The application of the selective draft law was approved and will be again when the need for it exists, but in my judgment, the American people will have none of the plans for compulsory service as the basis for a great standing army in time of peace.

Increased opportunities for military training as a part of the regular course in high schools and all the institutions of higher learning which is being rapidly extended under present laws will prove of great physical benefit to the student and will train for the future a vast reserve of most desirable officer and rank and file material.

An examination of Senate bill 3412, by Senator CALDER, which proposes several needed amendments to the present law, leads me to the conclusion that in some such measure as this, which will provide by amendment of the existing law for such changes as its operation has demonstrated to the friends of the National Guard are necessary, will be found the safest course in reconstructing this part of our military policy.

The history of the National Guard and its evolution through years of public and congressional indifference and neglect into that magnificent body of volunteers that led the van on so many bloody battle fields in Europe, and helped so vitally to write large on the most brilliant page of the world's military history the immortal record of America's service to mankind, is too familiar to require repetition and too important to be forgotten when Congress makes its final decision on the future military policy of the Nation.

Respectfully, yours,

J. B. A. ROBERTSON, Governor.

OF

HON. R. CLINT COLE,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents, and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, to me one of the chief rewards in being a Member of Congress is the opportunity it affords one to manifest his appreciation for the services and sacrifices of the men who made the continuation of our Congress and country a possibility.

Our fathers were right when they deemed it the primal purpose of government to bow to the will of the governed. As the tide of time rolled onward individuals appeared and vanished, nations rose and fell, but civilization advanced, each new nation an improvement over the old, until the adoption of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States of America, which express fundamentally the highest type of government of which the mind of man, aided by Divinity, is able to conceive. It was for the maintenance of that Government that the men for whom we to-day legislate paid such full measure of devotion.

I am unable to appreciate to the full the sacrifices they made. When the mighty Lincoln issued the call for troops to come to the defense of the Union, out of the hills and the valleys and towns and cities of the North these now venerable men came in ready response, started out on that historic march to the Southland, and out upon the morning and evening breezes stole the loud shouts of that grand Army as it thundered back the answer, "We are coming, Father Abraham, 300,000 strong." If I had, day after day, marched with them beneath the scorching rays of the Southern sun; had seen the brave comrades on my right and on my left mown down by the awful engines of war; had laid down to rest night after night, the bare, damp earth for a bed, the angry, rolling storm clouds a roof, the weird lightnings seething and hissing through the atmosphere, and the loud, roaring thunders making the nights hideous, then and not until then could I fully appreciate what they did. The best I can do now is to read and dream of those heroic days, and forever revere and praise and honor the men who so nobly endured them.

The heroic deeds of other days have scattered the clouds of disunion and slavery and permitted the brilliant sun of Americanism to rise higher and still higher into the widening canopy of national greatness. In every great crisis with which our Nation has been confronted our people have bespoken their patriotism and loyalty by offering themselves a willing sacrifice upon the altar of its perpetuity. It is out of the abundance of my appreciation for what these men have wrought that I give my voice and vote to these men to-day.

I know that economy should be the watchword of the country to-day. The tremendous debt of the great World War must be met. But economy must not be practiced at the expense and neglect of these venerable defenders of the flag. They stand the embodiment of genuine Americanism, and while they live no element or agency of destruction shall ever cause them to waver in their loyalty to the flag. They are growing old; for them the cold dews of the eternal night are gathering; soon the angel of death shall beat the low tattoo summoning the last one to his final reward. But while they do live we who support this measure can forever stand erect in the proud retrospection of having done our duty by them.

With no consideration for personal gain, with no thought for individual aggrandizement, in the prime of their young manhood, they bade adieu to home, friends, fame, and fortune, and to the wild, grand music of war marched away to do or die that the country might live. This Nation to-day stands a monument to their bravery and sacrifice, and as the effulgent beams of the receding sun of their earthly careers illuminate the grandeur of their achievement, let us pay them our respect and manifest our appreciation for their services by making it possible for them to better enjoy the comforts of life.

The Pension Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. S. D. FESS,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this bill, which will give additional relief to the surviving Civil War veteran and to the widow of him who has answered his last reveille.

On a former occasion I stated the debt this Nation owes to the hero of '61. We are too near his service to fully realize its meaning.

The historian in a thousand years from now will better estimate the value to self-government in the world contributed by the men who at the price of health and life proved to the world that a people can govern themselves. The historian will emphasize the fact that while a race was set free, was lifted out of the degredation of human chattelhood into the atmosphere of American citizenship, great as was that achievement, the greatest event of the Civil War was the perpetuation of our system of government, which is the first great Republic in history.

Europe's prophets and historians of the past, such as De Toqueville, and even Macauley, predicted a short life for this form of government. The one declared it would split on the rock of sectional difference, and the other declared it would break on the rock of class legislation. The fires of civil war fused the Nation into one indissoluble Union. And to-day, over a half century removed from that period, when only a small remnant of that grand Army of the Republic remains, the country's freedom from sectional strife was never so apparent.

The other danger is more prominent. Macauley's declaration that the time would come when the man on the street who could not ride for want of a carriage would make good his determination that no man shall ride is being echoed and reechoed in many quarters to-day here in our own country.

The Civil War veteran settled the sectional question, wiped off of our escutcheon the blot of slavery, resisted armed rebellion against the Nation, and relaid the foundation of the Republic which to-day is the most powerful of nations in all history. Since he completed his work and demonstrated the perpetuity of republican form of government our shores have been sought as the haven of the oppressed of earth. Among us are men and women who are agitating to overthrow the Government which the heroes of 1861 fought to perpetuate. The movement has reached the proportions of a well-organized campaign. It is for us, the beneficiaries of the service they rendered, to see to it that no step is omitted to deal swiftly with this new enemy within our midst. It is not only a loss to the world to permit these enemies to set at naught the contribution of these defenders of republican government to the world's history, but it would be a crime against the dead, as it would be the deepest insult to the living soldier.

Our first duty is to defend this Republic they saved against these outlaws. This bill is proposed to in part compensate for the service rendered, and while we owe a debt which can never be paid, we can at least do this much to help make their last days a period free from want. The bill will pass by a sweeping vote.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. M. C. SMITH,

OF MICHIGAN.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920.

On the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of liberal pensions for our veteran soldiers who fought our battles in war and for the relief of their dependent widows and children. When the dark clouds of the Rebellion first appeared in the sixties and the clarion notes of war called the flower of the Northland to the colors, we made the pledge that those who answered the call to arms would be cared for in their declining years and the wounds of the injured in battle would be made whole, as far as a grateful Nation could make them, and sealed that pledge with the honor of our country.

President Lincoln, in his second inaugural address, in speaking of the task before our veteran soldiers, stated:

> Let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the Nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphans.

Now, the day has come to fulfill that pledge and pay the debt. Some have contended that a pension is a gratuity. In this case it is an honorable obligation, a debt the Nation owes to those who in their young manhood bore arms for their country, instead of pursuing a profitable avocation and making for themselves a career. It was no compensation for a young man to join the Army for the pay of $13 per month. I do not think any of the veteran soldiers joined the colors for the mere compensation and pay of a private. They made the sacrifice and did their duty well. They helped their country in time of need, and now is the time of need for them, and their country is willing and eager to help them. It was no easy task, and the fortunes of war frequently changed sides. Out of the many encounters of larger or lesser extent of the Civil War may I mention some of the most significant:

[From World Almanac.]

Battles:	Casualties.
Gettysburg	23,001
Spotsylvania	18,396
Wilderness	17,666
Antietam	12,410
Chancellorsville	17,287
Chickamauga	16,179
Cold Harbor	12,737
Fredericksburg	12,653
Manassas	14,462
Shiloh	13,047
Stone River	13,249
Petersburg	11,386

Up to the present World War history fails to record such fighting as was done by our veteran soldiers of the Civil War. In fixing the amount of pension that should be paid to them we should not lose sight of their needs and do justice to both the public and the soldier. In determining the justice of their claim, let us ask ourselves what we would want by way of compensation to fight in some of the battles above recorded? Each of us would say that for the love of country we would be willing to lay down our lives, but not for worldly gain. The task and burden of battle fell heavy upon the veteran soldier of the Civil War. Michigan in 1860 had a population of 750,000; it furnished 90,000 soldiers.

I am pleased to record my vote willingly and freely for this bill granting an increase of pension to the soldiers, their widows and orphans, in recognition of their valor in war. It might be noted that our beloved country, during its existence of 140 years, has waged six wars, including the great World War. In each of them its national existence was at stake. In each of them our country pledged its entire man power and resources to its successful termination. In each of them our soldiers achieved a glorious victory. We have been a fighting Nation, and the American soldier covered himself with glory and bore high the standard of his country in every battle. In the recent World War, from the first Battle of Cantigny to the last Battle of Sedan, where a humiliating defeat was administered to the German Army on foreign soil, the American soldier never turned his back on the enemy. Retreat and defeat are unknown to the American armies; and our country, which owes its national existence and life to the American soldier, can now contribute to the relief of those who rendered such distinguished service and preserved the life of ours, the best of all nations.

The purchasing power of the pension now paid to the veteran soldier has greatly diminished. It was never too much. The amount carried by this bill while substantial will not equal the advance in the cost of the necessaries of life. The bill gives an added increase to those wounded in battle or impaired by disease. It increases the widow's pension and raises the allowance for the care of minor children. The bill passed the House by more than a two-thirds majority. I am pleased to insert a copy of the bill and trust it will be speedily passed by the Senate, receive the signature of the President, and become a law. With the enactment of this bill into law, I also hope that the payment of pensions will be made monthly instead of quarterly. It will be but a short time until these veterans have all been called to their final reward. The report filed in this case says that on the 30th day of June, 1919, there were 271,391 survivors of the Civil War on the pension roll; 293,244 widows of those who had died; 206 dependent parents of Union soldiers; 129 Civil War nurses; and 6,836 minor children. They are dying at the rate of 130 on an average each 24 hours, as stated by the chairman of the committee, and whatever we intend doing for them ought to be done now.

"A bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

month; that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost an arm at the shoulder joint or a leg at the hip joint, or so near the shoulder or hip joint, or where the same is in such condition as to prevent the use of an artificial limb, or shall have sustained a disability equivalent thereto, shall receive a pension at the rate of $72 per month; and that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost one hand and one foot, or been totally disabled in the same, or shall have sustained a disability equivalent thereto, shall receive a pension at the rate of $90 per month.

"SEC. 4. And this section shall apply to all former widows of persons who served for 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War and were honorably discharged from such service, or who, having so served for less than 90 days were discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, such widow having remarried, either once or more than once after the death of the soldier, sailor, or marine, if it be shown that such subsequent or successive marriage has, or have been dissolved, either by the death of the husband or husbands, or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife; and any such former widow shall be entitled to and be paid a pension at the rate of $30 per month; and any widow as mentioned in this section shall also be paid $6 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow having a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16 years: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of such child or during the period of such disability, and this proviso shall apply to all pensions heretofore granted or hereafter to be granted under this or any former statute: And provided further, That in case of any widow whose name has been dropped from the pension roll because of her remarriage, if the pension has been granted to an insane, idiotic, or otherwise helpless child, or to a child or children under the age of 16 years, she shall not be entitled to renewal of pension under this act until that pension to such child or children terminates, unless such child or children be a member or members of her family and cared for by her, and upon the renewal of pension to such widow, payment of pension to such child or children shall cease.

"SEC. 5. That all Army nurses of the Civil War, and all dependent parents of any officer or enlisted man who served in the Civil War whose names are now on the pension roll, or who are now entitled to pension under any existing law, shall be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

"SEC. 6. That the pension or increase of pension herein provided for, as to all persons whose names are now on the pension roll, or who are now in receipt of a pension under existing law, shall commence at the rates herein provided, from the date of the approval of this act, or under section 2 hereof, when the requisite condition is shown to exist after the approval of this act; and as to persons whose names are not now on the pension roll, or who are not now in receipt of a pension under existing law, but who may be entitled to pension under the provisions of this act, such pensions shall commence from the date of filing application therefor in the Bureau of Pensions in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That as to any former widow as mentioned in section 4 hereof, who since the death of her soldier, sailor, or marine husband has remarried either once or more than once, and such subsequent or successive marriage has been dissolved, either by the death of the husband or husbands, or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife, and who filed her application for pension under the act of September 8, 1916, her pension shall commence from the date when her original application was filed under that act in the Bureau of Pensions, and shall be at the rate in that act provided, with increase at the rate or rates subsequently provided for the widows of Civil War soldiers, sailors, and marines, and by this act from the date or dates when any such subsequent act or acts took effect or may hereafter take effect, it being the intent and purpose to give to any such widow the same status as other widows of Civil War soldiers, sailors, and marines who have not remarried, and from the date of said act of September 8, 1916.

"SEC. 7. That nothing in this act contained shall be held to affect or diminish the additional pension to those on the roll designated as 'The Army and Navy medal of honor roll,' as provided in the act of April 27, 1906, but any increase herein provided for shall be in addition thereto; and no pension heretofore granted under any act, public or private, shall be reduced by anything contained in this act.

"SEC. 8. That no claim agent or attorney or other person shall be recognized in the adjustment of claims under this act, except in claims for original pension, and in such cases no more than the sum of $10 shall be allowed for services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any such claim, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension allowed or due to such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court."

OF

HON. ISRAEL M. FOSTER,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents, and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, this bill, which I am pleased to support, provides, among other things, (a) $50 per month to each person serving 90 days or more in the United States Army, Navy, or Marines during the Civil War; (b) $72 per month for every such person who, on account of age or physical disability, has become helpless or blind, or so nearly so that he requires the constant care of another person; (c) $30 per month for the widows of such Civil War veterans; (d) those having lost an arm or leg in the service and thereby rendered helpless are given additional consideration independent of their age or service; (e) for dependent children of deceased soldiers; (f) for Army nurses of the Civil War, and dependent parents of officers and enlisted men whose names are now on the pension roll.

The debate on this bill has disclosed, among other things, that 2,600,000 men enlisted in the Union Army, of which number more than 2,000,000 are now deceased; that this bill adds $65,000,000 to the present pension rolls, which is not unreasonable when we consider that the last Congress expended $100,000,000 on feeding Europe; that these soldiers are dying off at the rate of one every 10 minutes, and because of their advanced years their ranks will be depleted more rapidly each year.

The richest country on earth can not afford to be anything but justly fair with the small remnant of this Army, concerning which Lincoln said:

> Let us care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and orphans.

We should not forget that this Army, among other things, freed 4,000,000 human beings from bondage; that it preserved the integrity of the first great Republic in the history of the world and allowed us to continue a "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people." This remnant of that grand Army now range in ages from 70 to 90. Because of their age they are without means of earning a living, and the least a grateful Republic should do is to deal liberally with them in their declining years. We have heard quoted here the great truth that "the only national debt we can never pay is the debt we owe to our victorious Union soldiers, sailors, and marines."

On June 16, 1919, I introduced H. R. 5904, which was similar to the bill now under consideration. The chief points of difference were that H. R. 5904 provided for $60 per month, whereas H. R. 9369 provides for $50 per month, and H. R. 5904 provided for $35 per month, whereas H. R. 9369 provides for $30 per month. In other words, the bill introduced by me allowed $60 per month for each soldier and $35 per month for each widow. The House has adopted a motion, "To suspend the rules and discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from further consideration of the bill H. R. 9369." With the adoption of this motion amendments are not in order. Because of this parliamentary status I shall support H. R. 9369 as now before the House, and I support this bill whole-heartedly, realizing that the Grand Army of the Republic at its recent convention at Columbus, Ohio, went on record in favor of this legislation. In supporting this bill we should bear in mind that the soldiers of the Civil War did not have many of the conveniences of our more recent war. The activities of the Red Cross, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Knights of Columbus, as now in evidence, were unknown to the men of the Civil War. Our insurance laws and our vocational training acts had no counterpart with the boys of '61. We are not disparaging our soldiers of the Spanish War and the World War in calling attention to the sacrifices necessarily undergone by the heroic men of the Civil War. I am sure that this House will, in order, treat the soldiers of these more recent wars with justice and consideration, and I have introduced bills which, if enacted into law, will, in my judgment, work substantial justice for our soldiers of both the Spanish War and the World War. I am intensely proud of the fact that my congressional district now has among its loyal citizens 1,500 survivors of the Union Army, each of whom contributed his utmost for the preservation of the Union and the freeing of a race then in bondage. While I remain a Member of this House I shall cast no vote with more genuine pleasure than when I support this bill, which will, I trust, contribute to the pleasure and happiness of this rapidly vanishing remnant of our Grand Army.

In closing these remarks, allow me to reproduce the "toasts," recited to us by our colleague, Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee, as follows:

A story is told that some time ago in New York five gentlemen of foreign birth chanced to meet. One was a Russian, one a Turk, one a Frenchman, one an American, and the other an Englishman. These gentlemen soon became bosom friends, and finally a champagne supper was proposed, at which each gentleman, to be in keeping with the ceremonies of such an occasion, was to propose a toast to his native country, the one giving the best toast to be at no expense for the wine.

The Russian said: "Here's to the stars and bars of Russia, that were never pulled down."

The Turk said: "Here's to the bird of Turkey, whose wings were never clipped."

The Frenchman: "Here's to the cock of France, whose feathers were never picked."

The American: "Here's to the Stars and Stripes of the United States of America, never trailed in defeat."

The Englishman: "Here's to the roarin', rampin' lion of Great Britain, that tore down the stars and bars of Russia, clipped the wings of Turkey, picked the feathers off the cock of France, and ran like h—— from the Stars and Stripes of the United States of America."

It is unnecessary to say the Englishman paid for no wine.

The Union Army made possible by its sacrifices a continuance of the truth contained in the above toast.

Let a Grateful Nation Make Smooth Their Pathway in Their Declining Years and Lift From Their Shoulders the Responsibilities They Are No Longer Able to Bear.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. SUMMERS,

OF WASHINGTON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, to-day we do tardy justice to the heroes of a past generation and a past century. The Civil War pension bill is before us. Common justice demands its speedy enactment by this House and by the Senate.

For liberal recognition of the defenders of these United States of America and our free Government and institutions, whether of the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, or of the great World War, I shall now and always give my support and my vote. A grateful Republic will not deal niggardly with her saviours.

We have appropriated many millions to feed the people of foreign lands, a hundred million at one time. Let us not forget our duty at home, especially to those to whom it was said that "The only national debt we can never pay is the debt we owe to our victorious Union soldiers, sailors, and marines." Also let us heed the admonition of Abraham Lincoln "To care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan." While we have done, are doing, and will do all possible for the young soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late World War, let us not forget nor neglect the survivors of that great struggle of more than half a century ago, the benefits of which have been a rich inheritance to every person whose privilege it has been to live under the protecting folds of the flag of the Union they saved and perpetuated. It is a surprising fact that so many of those old veterans are alive and with us yet. On the 30th day of June last there were on the pension roll 271,391 survivors of that war, 293,244 widows of those who had died, 206 dependent parents of Union soldiers, 129 Civil War nurses, and 6,836 minor children. That this bill, if enacted into law, will cost the Government a large sum of money goes without saying, but in comparison with some other expenses the amount seems almost negligible.

These are the eloquent words of Judge FULLER, chairman of the committee, with whom I fully agree:

These old veterans are leaving us in rapidly increasing numbers, and very soon they and their deeds will be only a memory. What a grateful Government does for them must be done soon in order that they may receive the benefits while they live. It is perhaps proper to say that the provisions of this bill were unanimously indorsed with great enthusiasm by the members of the Grand Army of the Republic at their national encampment at Columbus last year, and have been indorsed by many of the local camps throughout the country.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL.

This bill will raise the rate of all existing pensions of honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War who served 90 days or more or who were discharged for disability to $50 per month.

To the helpless and blind and to those who are so nearly so as to require constant or regular attention by an attendant it gives $72 per month.

To the veterans who lost one hand or foot, or sustained a disability equivalent thereto, it allows $60 per month.

For the loss of an arm at or near the shoulder, or a leg at or near the hip, it allows $72 per month.

For amputations at or above the elbow or knee, it allows $65 per month.

For the loss of a hand and foot, or for a disability equivalent thereto, it allows $90 per month.

Widows and Army nurses are granted $30 per month, while orphans under the age of 16 years are raised from $2 to $6 per month.

It extends the limit of time within which widows come within the provisions of the law 10 years.

The bill in full is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc., That every person who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, or who, having so served less than 90 days, was discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, and who is now in receipt of or entitled to receive under existing law a pension of less than $50 per month, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

SEC. 2. SEC. 3. That from and after the approval of this act all persons whose names are on the pension roll, and who, while in the service of the United States in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps during the Civil War, and in the line of duty, shall have lost one hand or one foot or been totally disabled in the same, or shall have sustained a disability equivalent thereto, shall receive a pension at the rate of $60 per month; that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost an arm at or above the elbow, or a leg at or above the knee, or been totally disabled in the same, or shall have sustained a disability equivalent thereto, shall receive a pension at the rate of $65 per month; that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost an arm at the shoulder joint or a leg at the hip joint, or so near the shoulder or hip joint, or where the same is in such condition as to prevent the use of an artificial limb, or shall have sustained a disability equivalent thereto, shall receive a pension at the rate of $72 per month; and that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost one hand and one foot, or been totally disabled in the same, or shall have sustained a disability equivalent thereto, shall receive a pension at the rate of $90 per month.

SEC. 4. That the widow of any person who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War for 90 days or more, and was honorably discharged from such service, or regardless of the length of service was discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, such widow having been married to such soldier, sailor, or marine prior to the 27th day of June, A. D. 1915, shall be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $30 per month. And this section shall apply to all former widows of persons who served for 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War and were honorably discharged from such service, or who, having so served for less than 90 days, were discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, such widow having remarried, either once or more than once after the death of the soldier, sailor, or marine, if it be shown that such subsequent or successive marriage has or have been dissolved, either by the death of the husband or husbands or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife; and any such former widow shall be entitled to and be paid a pension at the rate of $30 per month; and any widow as mentioned in this section shall also be paid $6 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow having a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16 years: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of such child, or during the period of such disability, and this proviso shall apply to all pensions heretofore granted or hereafter to be granted under this or any former statute: And provided further, That in case of any widow whose name has been dropped from the pension roll because of her remarriage, if the pension has been granted to an insane, idiotic, or otherwise helpless child, or to a child or children under the age of 16 years, she shall not be entitled to renewal of pension under this act until that pension to such child or children terminates, unless such child or children be a member or members of her family and cared for by her, and upon the renewal of pension to such widow payment of pension to such child or children shall cease.

SEC. 5. That all Army nurses of the Civil War, and all dependent parents of any officer or enlisted man who served in the Civil War whose names are now on the pension roll, or who are now entitled to pension under any existing law, shall be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

SEC. 6. That the pension or increase of pension herein provided for, as to all persons whose names are now on the pension roll, or who are now in receipt of a pension under existing law, shall commence at the rates herein provided, from the date of the approval of this act, or under section 2 hereof, when the requisite condition is shown to exist after the approval of this act; and as to persons whose names are not now on the pension roll, or who are not now in receipt of a pension under existing law, but who may be entitled to pension under the provisions of this act, such pensions shall commence from the date of filing application therefor in the Bureau of Pensions in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That as to any former widow as mentioned in section 4 hereof, who since the death of her soldier, sailor, or marine husband has remarried either once or more than once, and such subsequent or successive marriage has been dissolved, either by the death of the husband or husbands, or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife, and who filed her application for pension under the act of September 8, 1916, her pension shall commence from the date when her original application was filed under that act in the Bureau of Pensions, and shall be at the rate in that act provided, with increase at the rate or rates subsequently provided for the widows of Civil War soldiers, sailors, and marines, and by this act from the date or dates when any such subsequent act or acts took effect or may hereafter take effect, it being the intent and purpose to give to any such widow the same status as other widows of Civil War soldiers, sailors, and marines who have not remarried, and from the date of said act of September 8, 1916.

SEC. 7. That nothing in this act contained shall be held to affect or diminish the additional pension to those on the roll designated as "The Army and Navy Medal of Honor Roll," as provided in the act of April 27, 1906, but any increase herein provided for shall be in addition thereto; and no pension heretofore granted under any act, public or private, shall be reduced by anything contained in this act.

SEC. 8. That no claim agent or attorney or other person shall be recognized in the adjustment of claims under this act, except in claims for original pension, and in such cases no more than the sum of $10 shall be allowed for services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any such claim, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension allowed or due to such pensioner or claimant under this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. Speaker, almost 60 years have passed since Fort Sumter was fired upon and the irrepressible conflict engulfed our fair land; 60 years since Lincoln summoned an Army of 75,000, and then more and more calls were issued until 2,000,000 brave men out of the North were called to the colors to preserve the Union.

Sixty years since these gallant sons won undying fame at Henry and Donelson, at Shiloh and Corinth and Vicksburg, at Gettysburg, Chickamauga, and The Battle Above the Clouds; from Atlanta to the sea; at Spotsylvania and through the valley of the Shenandoah; at Petersburg and Richmond and on to Appomattox, where victory crowned four years of deprivation, of intense suffering, and heroic fighting in order that this Union might not be dissolved and that slavery should no longer stain our history.

Yea, Mr. Speaker, as I read the history of the world, including the present war, I verily believe the boys in blue from 1861 to 1865 not only upheld the flag and preserved the Union, but I believe they were an important factor in guaranteeing that free government shall not perish from the face of the earth.

These gallant defenders of Old Glory received $13 per month with never a thought of further compensation. They sacrificed for their country—for you and for me. And now 136 of these immortals are passing to the great beyond every 24 hours. But a few years and we shall know them no more forever.

Let a grateful Nation make smooth their pathway in their declining years and lift from their shoulders the responsibilities they are no longer able to bear.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MOSES P. KINKAID,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the enactment of this bill, but I do not regard the increases of the rates of pensions provided as a gratuity or bounty, as some denominate it, or in any sense as a charity, but I view the increases proposed as the performance of an obligation incurred by our Government, you may call it legal or moral, I am not particular which. I regard the granting of these increases as the doing of justice already too long deferred.

But I want to emphasize that, in my opinion, the plea of economy made by a very few in opposition to the measure, is untenable and demurrable, just as much so as it would be for the maker of a promissory note, past due, or one indebted for groceries for the consumption of his household or for a doctor's bill to be heard to say, "I must be excused from making payment, because I have resolved to practice rigid economy in the use of my cash." We must not forget that the foundation of our Government was laid by a revolution, victoriously fought by our colonial armies, and that the domain we then possessed has been expanded and the Governments, State and National, we now enjoy, built up, preserved, and strengthened by the sacrifices made by our citizens as soldiers in subsequent wars. Pensions have been granted soldiers of all of these wars, so that it is a well-settled custom to grant reasonable pensions, and this custom just about creates a legal obligation. At least it justifies everyone who is called into war in assuming that pensions will be granted to the survivors of the war and their dependents. This custom is abundantly established by the numerous statutes, public and private, passed for the payment of pensions since the Revolutionary War. The custom is additionally verified by the records in the Treasury and the Bureau of Pensions, showing the numerous appropriations made for the payment of pensions.

Commencing back only as far as 1865, the annual appropriations made up to and including 1919 for pensions alone, without counting the expenses of the administration of the pension laws, amounted to $5,521,074,958.16. It was in 1902 that the high-water mark in the number of pensioners was reached, the number being 999,446. Since then the mortality rate has shown a steady increase, with the result of a marked reduction in the number of soldiers of the Civil War who draw pensions. On the 30th of June, 1919, there remained on the pension roll of these veterans of the Civil War but 271,391, a reduction of 332,570 since January 1, 1910. Of course, besides this are the dependents of these veterans, approximating 250,000. During the fiscal year of 1919, as reported by the Bureau of Pensions, 27,703 of these veterans and 19,217 of their widows passed to the great beyond. Naturally the proportionate mortality rate will continue to increase, and soon all these deserving and grand old patriots will be known only in our grateful memories. Perchance a very few may be blessed with great longevity like the veteran of the Mexican War, who was alive last summer at the age of 112 years. It is easy to believe his life may have been prolonged by the material aid afforded by his pension, coupled with his consciousness of this governmental recognition of the sacrifices he made.

But the increases provided are apparent rather than real. Due to the greatly increased cost of living, and the correspondingly decreased purchasing power of the dollar, these veterans will not fare any better with the new rates than they did with existing rates before the war, until the cost of living shall be reduced.

The bill grants all who served 90 days or more, or who were discharged for a disability before 90 days, $50 per month; helpless or blind, $72; loss of one hand or one foot, or a disability equivalent, $60; loss of arm above elbow or leg above knee, or totally disabled in same, $65; loss of arm at shoulder joint or leg at hip joint, or unable to use artificial limb or equal disability, $72; loss of one hand and one foot or an equivalent injury, $90; any widow of eligible soldier married prior to June 27, 1915, $30; remarried widows becoming widows without their fault, $30, with $6 for each child under 16 years of age; Army nurses and dependent parents of enlisted man or officer, $30.

But I repeat, the relief provided for these soldiers and their dependents has been much too long deferred, and that now the "eleventh hour" is up to the Congress in which to do them justice. I hope the bill may pass as speedily in the Senate as it is going to pass here, which is an exceptionally short time.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, January 10, 1920,

On the resolution (H. Res. 434) offered by Mr. DALLINGER declaring Victor L. Berger not entitled to a seat in the Sixty-sixth Congress from the fifth congressional district in the State of Wisconsin and declining to permit him to take the oath and qualify as such Representative.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am opposed to the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], because I consider it premature and ill timed. In my opinion it is not becoming to this House, said to be the greatest deliberative body in the world, to deny to any man, whatever his opinions, his day in court. It is unfair to a large constituency of American voters in one of the sovereign States to say offhand, without deliberation, that their constitutional right of representation in the American Congress shall be denied simply because the individual of their choice is not personally acceptable to the present membership of this body. It is true that the ground of aversion to Mr. Berger is founded on a very grave charge, and I hope I may not be misunderstood as countenancing or condoning his attitude during the war, but what I maintain is that his expulsion now at this moment, predicated wholly upon our individual opinion of his fitness, will establish a vicious and dangerous precedent. If we claim the right now to expel a duly elected representative of a sovereign State because of our individual conception of his patriotism the precedent thus established may be conceivably used to justify expulsion on less substantial grounds, the measure of the turpitude being the temporary attitude of the House.

The question presents no difficulty except such as we make for ourselves. Mr. Berger was duly tried for his sentiments and his attitude during the war. He was found guilty by a jury of his peers. He has taken advantage of his constitutional right to file an appeal. That appeal is still pending.

Now, my attitude is this: I am willing to take the final determination of our courts as to his guilt or innocence of the charge against him. I do not think, however, that it is fair to anticipate the judicial determination. If the court finds him guilty of the criminal charge against him, then, ipso facto, his right to a seat in this body fails. I would be the last man in the world to fly in the face of our courts, which I hold to be the bulwarks of our liberty. I therefore want to offer a substitute for the resolution before us, as follows:

Whereas by resolution duly passed on the 10th day of November, 1919, Victor L. Berger was declared not entitled to a seat in this House as Representative from the fifth congressional district of the State of Wisconsin; and

Whereas by resolution duly passed by this House on the same day a vacancy was declared to exist in said district; and

Whereas the said Victor L. Berger was thereafter, at an election duly called, elected as Representative from said district to fill said vacancy:

Resolved, That the question of the prima facie right of said Victor L. Berger to be sworn in as such Representative of the State of Wisconsin in the Sixty-sixth Congress, as well as of his final right to said seat, be deferred until the appeal now pending in a certain criminal proceeding in the United States circuit court of appeals, entitled "The United States v. Victor L. Berger et al.," shall be determined or until the further order of this House.

Under this resolution Mr. Berger would be kept waiting at the door until his appeal was determined, and then the House could act deliberately, according to its best judgment, without establishing a dangerous precedent and without calling upon the Members of the House to substitute their individual opinion of his fitness in the place and stead of a court decision.

I do not wish to be understood as impeaching the patriotism or sincerity of those who clamor for instant action. However, I can not fail to observe that it is very closely analogous to the "direct-action" policies of the very class against which gentlemen in this House are so prone to inveigh and which they profess so deeply to reprobate and despise.

This precipitancy smacks too much of lynch law. Justice is a cautious goddess, whose stride is slow and solemn. She should not be made to dance to the music of passion or to hurry before the goad of hate or fear. One would think we were on the verge of revolution and the Bolshevists were thundering at our gates.

We are assured by the gentlemen who stand for instant expulsion that they do not care whether Mr. Berger was convicted or not or whether or not his conviction by the courts is ultimately withheld. They claim that his conviction by the court had no weight with them or with the special committee of this House which passed upon his fitness. Let us see: The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], in presenting the report of the committee to the House, on November 10, 1919, said that he made the objection to the swearing in of Mr. Berger, "relying upon public records and papers." Proceeding further, he said:

The public records referred to consisted of the reading of the trial of the case of the United States against Victor L. Berger et al. at Chicago last December and in January of the present year (1919), and a certified copy of the record in the Circuit Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia in the proceeding when the second-class mailing privilege of the Milwaukee Leader, Mr. Berger's paper, was revoked.

The records of Mr. Berger's trial for obstructing the war constitute a separate volume of the hearings of the House special committee, consisting of 765 finely printed pages.

If it was not the intention of the special committee to consider the minutes and records of the trial, why were they laid before the committee?

Try as you may, you can not avoid the conviction that the record of the Chicago trial had its influence with the special committee which passed upon Mr. Berger's case last November. That is the general opinion of the public to-day. Only a few days ago the New York Herald, in discussing the unseating of the Socialist members of the assembly in the State of New York, said:

The cases are in no way analogous to that of Victor Berger, whose dismissal from the House of Representatives was based on conviction of a crime against the laws of his country and not on any political views that he held.

As a matter of fact, the relation of the Chicago trial to the determination of the House special committee is the subject of much mystery. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], in presenting its report, said:

Now, at the first meeting of the committee, the committee being appointed on May 21, 1919, the whole question was discussed. There were two courses open to the committee. One was to rely upon the naked conviction at Chicago, in the case just referred to—the fact that a United States jury had convicted Mr. Berger for a violation of the espionage law and a United States judge had sentenced him to 20 years in the penitentiary. If such a course had been taken there would have been no necessity for any hearings before your committee.

With all due deference, I submit the gentleman is wrong in his deduction. He must know, able lawyer that he is, that he could not have relied on the "naked conviction" alone, for, while an appeal is pending, the question of guilt or innocence is in doubt. Every man is entitled to his day in court, and that includes not only the original trial but all appeals up to final adjudication in the court of last resort. Therefore it is manifest that he could not have relied upon the "naked conviction." Instead of two courses there was only one course, and that was to pass upon Mr. Berger's conduct during the war upon the best evidence obtainable.

Whether or not that course was right is open to grave doubts. There is no higher determination than a court determination. The committee knew that, as things then stood, there was no court determination, and that while the case was still in the scales of justice, with an appeal undecided, they could not set up the lower court's decision as the basis of their action.

In this predicament, what did they do? They took the records of the Chicago trial and the District of Columbia proceeding against Berger's newspaper and undertook the task of passing upon the merits of the evidence. This is a most extraordinary procedure and utterly at variance with the basic principles of our law and of our institutions. In effect it was to set up their opinion of the evidence against the opinion of the jury and the court. Suppose their determination, after reading the evidence, had been in conflict with the jury's verdict? What then? What a mess they would be in? Would they have come here with a report that, after reviewing the evidence, they had come to the conclusion that the verdict was against the law and the facts? And if they did, do not you see what a muddle this would lead to? If such a complication is inconceivable, then you must challenge the good faith of the committee and contend that when they decided to review the court evidence they knew in advance that their determination would not differ from that of the jury.

Such a course as this should not receive our sanction. It is not the function of this House to pass on guilt or innocence. That is the function of our courts, the coordinate branch of our Government established in our Constitution to protect our rights and liberty. We as a legislature have no concurrent power in that sphere, except in the case of impeachments, and in such cases the Senate alone is invested with judicial power.

I know it is claimed that the House has judicial power in certain cases by virtue of its constitutional right to judge of the qualifications of its membership. The only qualifications mentioned in Article I, section 2, paragraph 2 of the Constitution refer to age, citizenship, and length of residence in the State. The causes for disqualification, outside of these, must be founded upon interpretation or deduction or looked for elsewhere. The fact that the Constitution is silent as to the conditions of disqualification shows that its wise framers never suspected that an American Congress would ever need a guidepost or would ever use its power recklessly or unjustly. It was left in our hands, and the very plenitude and extent of our latitude should warn us to exercise it with caution.

In cases under the fourteenth amendment where the giving of aid and comfort to our enemies is specifically mentioned as a disqualification, there should be no difficulty or excuse for confusion in our procedure. Giving aid and comfort to the enemy is treason, and treason is a crime. If a man is charged with that most heinous offense he should be tried; but he should be tried by the courts and not by our National Legislature. Where guilt or innocence of a felony is relied on to exclude a duly elected representative from his seat in this House it is better that we first have a court decision. And when we get it do not let us fool ourselves into the belief that our opinion will not be affected by it. Our opinion should be affected by it. We ought to rely on the court determination. If a man has been tried in our courts and found guilty of a felony he ought to be excluded from membership in this House. But we ought not to take from him his right to appeal or catch him at a disadvantage before his appeal is finally determined.

This, gentlemen, is the extent of my disagreement with you. It is purely on constitutional grounds. I want to see the body of which I have the honor to be a Member act with deliberation and with such manifest concern for the protection of the rights of all that no excuse will ever be given for the growth of Bolshevism and discontent in our beloved land.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. KING,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill, H. R. 9369, will no doubt add very much to the comfort of the Civil War veterans that it is intended to benefit, and I cheerfully vote for it as the best that we can get at the present time, but I must say that the provisions of section 3, intended to increase the pensions of those who have lost an arm or a leg, or have been totally disabled in the same from gunshot wounds, does not fully meet my approval. We have had pending before the House ever since I came into Congress bills more liberal as to rates and of broader scope as to provisions, some of which are new, which should have been placed on the statute book long ago. I refer to the provision recognizing, in addition to those "totally disabled in the same," those who have suffered excision, resection, or ankylosis of a joint, whether of ankle, elbow, or shoulder, and I have in mind the case of a splendid soldier, Hon. Henry D. Fulton, now department commander of the Grand Army of the Republic of Illinois, who when a boy of but 17 years old was shot through the shoulder and suffered excision of all the bones of the shoulder, leaving his arm hang as a totally useless appendage to his body.

I learn there are a number of others who are also disabled by excision or resection of the joint, some of whom have been properly recognized under the rules of the Bureau of Pensions as being entitled to pension in the class known as "totally disabled in the same." In addition to the person above named, a number of others, however, have been ignored by the Bureau of Pensions and consequently have never received the rate of pension they were entitled to and I take it that the Committee on Invalid Pensions would have done themselves high honor had they adopted the language of H. R. 2922 in place of that embodied in section 3 of the bill now before the House. At this point let me say that we all recognize that in matters of legislation as well as warfare it is the man behind the proposition or the gun who does the effective work, and I desire to render honor to one to whom it is due for his faithful, persevering, patient and intelligently directed work for more than 40 years with Congress in behalf of his maimed veteran comrades as secretary of their organization the United States Maimed Soldiers' League, a unique organization, of which there has never been the like composed, as it is entirely of those who lost an arm or a leg on the firing line or were totally disabled in the same by gunshot wounds. Dr. James M. McGee, the secretary of their league from the date of its organization, August 10, 1880, has made a lifetime study from the medical and surgical standpoint of gunshot wounds of the maimed soldiers. In addition Dr. McGee is also equally as well learned in pension law and the rules of practice of the Bureau of Pensions and is held in high esteem by all who have met him in the many years that he had been laboring with Congress in the interest of his maimed comrades. It therefore gives me great pleasure, and I consider it my duty to thus render honor to this brave soldier who lost his right leg in the Battle of the Wilderness May 5, 1864, and who to this day suffers at times greatly with neuralgic pains in the stump of his limb. Truly for him and those like him the Civil War has never ended.

Pensions for Civil War Veterans.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM N. VAILE,

OF COLORADO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, nearly 21 years ago a young lady relative, then in her junior year at college, visited me when I was in camp with my organization of United States Volunteers during the Spanish War. She saw the regiment lined up at "retreat." Her remark afterwards was, "How young they look! I didn't realize that soldiers were such young men." They were indeed young men, mostly in their early twenties, with a few in their teens. We all know that wars are fought by young men, but it took the war now fortunately ending to visualize that fact for most of us.

But my visitor's remark involves another idea; it was based on her observation up to that time, and this fact impresses me strongly at this hour: My visitor of a score of years ago was then a score of years old, and unconsciously visualized soldiers as old men. Why? Why, naturally because the soldiers that she had known during her 15 or 16 years of clear memory were not young men, but were already middle-aged or elderly men. But it was nearly 21 years ago that this witness thus spontaneously expressed her impressions of that moment concerning the age of soldiers. Those whom she knew as old men then are 21 years older now or else are sleeping in the ground which they defended.

The fresh-faced, eager lad who kissed his mother good-by in 1861, a year before he was old enough to vote, has now gone four-fifths of a decade beyond our average allotted span of life. Even the lad of 16 whose zeal and ingenuity sometimes enabled him to slip past the recruiting officer when the girls were snickering at his first moustache is 74 this year.

A few days ago I talked with a Member of the House who was opposed to general pension increases for Civil War veterans because many of them were "rich old men." He even knew several such in his own town. I sincerely hope there are a good many such. They deserve every worldly success which they may have attained under the laws of a grateful Republic. But I feel a disquieting certainty that there are very few such "rich veterans," and that certainty is based on the figures of the life insurance agents. You know those chaps have a very disconcerting habit of pulling the figures on you to prove their argument, and they tell me that approximately 90 per cent of men at the age of 70 are dependent either upon relatives or charity for a livelihood. Of the remaining 10 per cent, the great majority are dependent upon their own savings, and only a very small handful can then live solely by their current earnings.

"Moral," says the insurance man, "purchase an endowment policy while you are young." You submit to the logic, pull out your check book, and make a date with the insurance company's doctor. And Uncle Sam has now learned enough from the insurance man to adopt the argument with reference to our soldiers of the late war, though we have not yet provided insurance which shall be payable to themselves except for disability incurred in the service.

Unsatisfactory as these provisions of the war-risk insurance and compensation acts still are—and they have been made more so by the way the bureaus were heretofore administered—they are still a vast improvement on the compensation provided for the veterans of the Civil War. Those men, all elderly and many old 20 years ago, have always had to rely on the charity of the Government.

The argument is certainly ample that they now need this increase. A flat increase to $50 per month for all honorably discharged veterans of the Civil War, an increase to $72 per month for all totally disabled veterans of the Civil War, is certainly not more than these old men need when they buy groceries with the 30-cent dollar of to-day. But I prefer to rest my argument on a broader ground, the ground not that they need this money but that they deserve it, deserve it for the patriotism which carried them in box cars to camps lacking the modern sanitation, electric lights, and shower baths of to-day; which carried them through the bloody hells of Manassas, Shiloh, and Chickamauga; which sustained them in the filth and misery of Andersonville; above all for the patriotism which has made these men for more than half a century the greatest single factor in the consecration of the Nation to the maintenance of liberty under the law and to the perpetuation of government of the people, by the people, and for the people. It has been well said by Judge FULLER, the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, that "the only national debt that we can never pay is the debt we owe to our victorious Union soldiers, sailors, and marines." The reason we can never pay the debt is that if it were not for their services we never could pay any debt, because we would not exist as a Nation.

In an important sense these men never will be old. They possess, as do no other group of men, the eternal youth of enthusiasm, of high ideals, and of hope. Most valuable, indeed, to the rest of us has been their possession of these qualities, but enthusiasm can not pay grocery bills when it is hobbled by palsied hands and dragging feet. High ideals inspire posterity and afford the hope of a future reward to the beloved old men who are leaving us now at the rate of 136 every 24 hours, but high ideals do not in this cold world compete very successfully with the high cost of living. And hope deferred maketh the heart sick.

Let us not longer defer the just hopes of the men without whose aid the Republic would be hopeless and helpless to-day.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FLORIAN LAMPERT,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents, and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Mr. LAMPERT. Mr. Speaker, it will afford me genuine pleasure to be given an opportunity to vote for this bill, granting additional relief to the surviving Civil War veterans and to the widows and orphans of those who have passed from the living ranks of the Grand Army of the Republic.

This bill in a measure will compensate the services of the heroes of 1861. It will in a measure show our appreciation of the sacrifices endured by those who have freed the bondmen from the chains of slavery, who have resisted the armed rebellion against the Nation, and strengthened the foundation of this Republic which to-day is the guiding star to a world democracy.

The events of the great World War are vividly impressed upon our minds. We to-day have a fuller appreciation of the meaning of freedom and independence. What this country has accomplished for humanity in the late world struggle was made possible because this Union was preserved and perpetuated by the valiant Army of the days of the Civil War.

We have not counted the cost of our participation in the World War, because we were determined that this Nation shall remain free and independent, and the blessings of democracy shall be assured not only unto us but also unto future generations.

We of to-day who cherish so highly the privileges of free men can not be unmindful of the warriors of 1861 who have made it possible for us to enjoy the treasures of free citizenship. America will never forget the devotion and the untold hardships of the Civil War veterans. Hard-hearted and ungrateful would that individual be who would refuse to minister to the wants and comforts of the Nation's defenders. True, the watchword of to-day is economy. But we can not practice economy at the expense of this most deserving class of American citizens. Every one will concede that with the present increased cost of living the allowance made heretofore to Civil War pensioners is wholly insufficient and inadequate to meet their wants and needs. A grateful Nation can not and will not allow them to suffer any privation. We must be solicitous of their comforts and necessities in their declining years.

I am moved to support this bill not by any considerations of charity, but by my conception of right and justice. The pension roll was and is to-day a roll of honor. A place on that roll does not mean that the recipient of a pension is a dependent on the Nation's bounty, but that he is entitled to recognition at the hands of a grateful people for the services rendered and sacrifices endured.

In the present day of peace and liberty throughout the world no soldier who has ever fought beneath the banner of this free Republic should know what want and neglect mean. By passing this bill we are discharging in a small manner our obligation to these deserving veterans. Under the provisions of this bill the widow and orphan of every departed Civil War veterar will not feel the sting of hunger or the pangs of poverty.

The provisions of this bill were unanimously indorsed with enthusiasm by the members of the Grand Army of the Republic. Under its provisions every honorably discharged Civil War veteran who has incurred disability in service, and in the line of duty, shall be entitled to a minimum pension at the rate of $50 per month. The dependents of the deceased veterans are also well provided for by the terms of this act. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that this bill is deserving of the support of every man who has in his bosom a spark of affection for the heroes living and for the dependents of the heroes departed. I trust this bill will pass the House by an overwhelming majority.

The Pension Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. KLECZKA.

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents, and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be given an opportunity to vote for this meritorious bill. There is no class of American citizens more deserving of consideration at the hands of this Congress than the splendid body of surviving veterans of the Civil War. The provisions of this bill under consideration are nothing more than a concrete expression of the country's gratitude to the Nation's defenders. By its provisions every honorably discharged Civil War veteran, who was discharged for disability incurred in service and in line of duty, shall receive a minimum pension of $50. The other provisions of the bill relating to the pensioning of widows and children of these veterans are likewise just and worthy.

The enactment of this measure is a matter of imperative urgency. We are but in a small measure discharging the debt that we owe to the surviving veterans of the Civil War and their dependents. We can never adequately compensate them for their services. Their heroic efforts and sacrifices endured can not be measured by any monetary standards. Properly it has been said that "the only national debt we can never pay is the debt we owe to our victorious Union soldiers, sailors, and marines."

The spirit of the day is one of gratitude to those who have fought and bled in order that the Union might be preserved, and in order that we and succeeding generations might continue to enjoy the blessings of a free people. We have liberally provided for the starving people of foreign lands; we have not counted the cost nor the sacrifices. Well, then, does it behoove us, in keeping with the spirit of the times, to act in a generous manner to those who have done so much for this Republic.

These valiant defenders of the Union are now in the evening of their lives. A grateful Government should do everything in its power to make their declining years as comfortable as possible. With the advanced cost of the necessaries and commodities of life, it is necessary to increase their pensions, so that they will not feel any want or discomfort.

I am not prompted by any impulse of charity to support this measure. I am only actuated by my sense of justice. The Northwestern Branch of the Soldiers' Home is located in my district. I have had occasion to meet many of these veterans. I know something of the infirmities and physical incapacities of a great number of these veterans. No man whose heart responds to the transports of patriotism can refuse to grant them every proper and just allowance. No man with a spark of appreciation of their valor and heroism could refuse them any provision necessary for their health and comfort and well-being. That is the very least we can do for them.

I am sure that this measure when enacted into law will bring happiness and relief to these veterans. It will serve as a reassuring message that we are ever mindful of their needs and wants, and not ungrateful or forgetful of their services and sacrifices. Ingratitude is the worst of human offenses. Happily, it can be said that the American people have never been ungrateful to the warriors who made this Union a permanency and who secured unto us and to unborn generations all those priceless rights and privileges and blessings which the American people hold so dear.

The Fuller Pension Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. C. ELLIS MOORE,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 5, 1920.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, to-day presents the opportunity which I have eagerly sought in my official life to record my vote in favor of increasing the pension of soldiers of the Civil War and the widows of those who have answered the last call. To me this is a real opportunity to show appreciation, even in a small way, of the sacrifices of the men who preserved the Union and freed the slave.

I have no doubt that every Member of the Congress has been touched by the appeals that have come to him from the soldier or widow in distress and need, who has been making a losing fight with the high cost of living. We regret to recognize the fact, and yet our observation compels us to note that the boys of the sixties who fought for the Union are now in declining years and are fast passing away.

It is all right for us to speak in eulogistic terms on Memorial Day of these brave men, and mingle our tears and flowers on the graves of our heroic dead, but let us evidence our sincerity by doing something substantial by giving support when it is needed and can be appreciated.

The only objection that has been urged to this legislation is that of economy. We all want to economize in our expenditures in every proper way, and yet I hesitate to believe that there is any patriotic citizen who would advocate that it is proper economy to refuse to support these veterans in their declining years under the present conditions of living.

These soldiers saved to posterity a nation, rich and prosperous, and out of our great prosperity it occurs to me that we can do nothing more splendid than to increase the pension of those who served the Nation in her hour of supreme need. The gratitude and appreciation of our citizenship of the valor, sacrifice, and suffering of the veterans of the Civil War should be manifest, and the passage of this bill is one of the best ways to indicate it.

It is said that when Gen. Sherman lay upon his sick bed the newspapers carried the statement that "Gen. Sherman is putting up his last fight, and it looks like he will lose." It will be a sad day to us when we follow the body of the last soldier of the Civil War to his final resting place in the Nation which he saved from disunion and disorganization. We should hasten to pass this legislation at the earliest possible moment to meet the needs of those who are deserving and make their closing days as comfortable as possible.

We are told that to-day when the sun goes down in the west, while we have been considering this legislation, 130 veterans and widows of veterans of the Civil War will have passed to the great beyond. Certainly when they are passing away so rapidly we shall do well to properly support them while they are with us, for soon it will be too late.

The figures at the Pension Department disclose that the 1st of last June there were more than 271,000 survivors of the Civil War and more than 293,000 of the widows of these. The records also disclose that in my own district there were 1,425 veterans of the Civil War on the 1st day of January, 1920. Of this number 253 are in my own county, Guernsey; 114 in Monroe; 144 in Morgan; 443 in Muskingum; 110 in Noble; and 361 in Washington. I know many of these men personally. They were as brave as any who fought under the flag, and are yet active and interested in everything that concerns good citizenship and the Republic which endures because of their service and sacrifice.

All the soldiers of all our wars are generally patriotic, and they are not the disturbing classes of to-day. Indeed, the soldiers in all our wars remember their sacrifices and seem to appreciate fully our liberty and privileges as a people, and they are the most determined class in America, having resolved that our liberty and free institutions must be preserved and safeguarded.

To the soldiers of all our wars, as legislators, we should pledge at all times our careful and thoughtful consideration for everything that makes for their comfort and contentment. Many bills have been introduced and others will be fo aid the soldiers of all our wars. This one refers particularly to the soldiers of the Civil War who are aged and need this legislation. I know of cases that this legislation will not relieve, and yet I realize the difficulty of passing a bill that will give relief to everyone. I hope in some way every soldier and widow will be provided for by our Government in a way that becomes a great Nation such as ours.

We can to-day learn many lessons from the courage, sacrifice, and devotion of these men who saved the Union in a day of peril. They sacrificed and gave up a great deal that was near and dear to them, and every free people must give up something in order that the fundamental rights and privileges of a republic may become sure and certain. These soldiers of the Civil War fought for liberty, real and true, a liberty which respected the rights of others and did not demand a license of wrongdoing or selfishness that would favor any class as opposed to the people of the whole Union. They fought for a united people, with common interests, and we can learn a lesson from this and protect the Republic from all its enemies and develop a citizenship willing and anxious to preserve our institutions and the greatest Government of all time.

It remains for us to preserve the Union which the veterans of the Civil War saved from dissolution. To my mind there is no alternative of our republican form of government but anarchy. We do not need to fear anarchy in this country, but we do need to fear its baneful teachings, and must do everything to rid the country of those who are out of sympathy with our Government and its institutions.

By the enactment of this legislation we shall be inspired by the recollection of the deeds of these heroes of the Civil War, and we shall resolve with determination and courage that there shall indeed be but one flag in this Republic, and every person under its protection must be loyal to it and it alone.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVAN T. FULLER,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 12, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 7158) to provide for the expenses of the District of Columbia.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, nearly 50 years ago—to be exact, in 1878—to provide for the expenses for the District of Columbia Congress passed the following law:

Congress shall appropriate the amount of 50 per cent thereof—

Having reference to the estimates of the Commissioners of the District for the expenses of the District—and the remaining 50 per cent of such approved estimates shall be levied and assessed upon the taxable property and privileges in said District other than the property of the United States and the District of Columbia.

Without doubt, this provision was fair enough under the very special conditions existing at that time, when the city was on the very verge of actual bankruptcy, through gross mismanagement, with a debt of about $150 per capita, but it is now perfectly apparent, when the finances of the District are in splendid condition, with a lower tax rate than any city of its size in the country, and when it will have no indebtedness at all, including bonds, in less than three years, that this so-called 50–50 plan is working a needless and useless expense upon the Government, which is evidenced by the fact that a surplus has been created of over $4,000,000, now lying in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia, which amount is not only increasing from year to year, and will, under the present system, continue to increase from year to year, but which surplus under the existing law can never be used.

Is there any better time to save the Government money than right now, when people are being taxed to the limit, especially when such a saving can be effected without injury to anyone?

The bill under discussion does not propose, and will not effect, an increase in taxes on the residents of the District of Columbia. It merely provides, to quote the language of the bill itself, that the "expenses of the District of Columbia shall be paid from and after July 1, 1920, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia to the extent that such revenues shall be sufficient therefor, and the remainder shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States."

I understand that taxation in the District has increased only 6 per cent in six years, yet the value on real estate has increased more than 100 per cent in that time. In fact, to my knowledge, there is not another city in the country with a population of 400,000 that has as low a tax rate as the District of Columbia.

It is an incredible situation for Congress to consider the perpetuation of an archaic law which raises a larger amount of money each year than is necessary, and this is especially reprehensible when the fact is borne in mind that the excess so raised can not be expended for any purpose whatsoever, but must simply remain as a credit to the District. What business concern would allow such a condition to continue?

We hear a great deal of talk at the present time of curtailing expenses; that appropriations are to be cut, employees dismissed, and so on. Right in my home State of Massachusetts 1,500 men were recently discharged from the Boston Navy Yard not, mind you, on account of lack of work—for the operations of our Navy during the past four years have created a tremendous amount of repair work—but on account of lack of funds to pay the men to carry on the work. A constituent of mine wrote me this very week that she was informed by the Post Office Department that she had been awarded the sum of $20 on account of some claim she had for damages to a registered merchandise package in the mail, but that the department could not pay the $20 because there was no funds to pay it with. And all this while there is a surplus of $4,063,922.18 right now in the United States Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia, which will be constantly added to so long as this antiquated 50-50 law shall obtain.

Post Office Appropriation Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HALVOR STEENERSON,
OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 15, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 11578) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, it is to be regretted that the Postmaster General's report reads more like partisan political propaganda than an official document. In nearly every chapter reference is made to the year 1913, the beginning of the present administration, and an attempt is made to contrast the wonderful achievement since that year with the accomplishment that preceded it. A good illustration of this is the chapter on foreign-mail service.

It should be remembered that under the ocean mail act of 1891, commonly called the mail subsidy act, steamships of the first class are paid $2 per mile, outward voyage; second class, $1 per mile; and third class, 66⅔ cents per mile, and in consideration of this payment they are to carry all the mail offered, without regard to quantity. Ships operating under this act are known as contract vessels and others are known as noncontract vessels, and these are paid, if United States register, 80 cents per pound for letters and 8 cents per pound for other articles, and if of foreign register, 35 cents per pound for letters and 4½ cents per pound for other matter.

The Postmaster General in his report says:

The cost from 1892 to June 30, 1912, of carrying the mails by contract ships, authorized under the ocean mail act of 1891, was $8,000,000 more than if carried at the pound-rate charge of noncontract ships. Through intelligent management the cost of contract service for the six fiscal years ending June 30, 1919, was reduced to $2,566,694.35 less than it would have cost if the mails had been carried by noncontract vessels.

The 20 years from 1892 to 1912 represent the first two decades of operation under the ocean mail act, and the amount of mail carried gradually increased. During this period there was no parcel post. This was inaugurated in 1913, and the volume of mail, especially the foreign mail, gradually grew, until of late years, by reason of the increase in volume, the compensation by the mile was actually less than the vessels would have received if they had carried by the pound under the legal rates.

Credit for both the mail subsidy act and the parcel post act should be given to the Republican Party, which was in power when these statutes were enacted. The fact that the service is now cheaper than if it were paid for by the pound at the statutory rates is due to the increased volume of mail and the encouragement to trade by those laws.

In the face of this the Postmaster General says, "Through intelligent management the cost of contract service has been reduced," and so forth.

Further, under the head of "Foreign mail service," the Postmaster General states:

Upon the opening of the Panama Canal arrangement was made so that the mails dispatched from the United States for the west coasts of Central and South America instead of being transported across the Isthmus by railway were, as far as possible, transshipped from steamer to steamer at Colon, thereby very greatly reducing the expense to the department on account of transportation across the Isthmus. The cost of transporting the mails across the Isthmus during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913, was $149,732.92 and for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1919, it was $12,732.94.

The evident intent and purpose of this statement is to point out that the present administration has accomplished a great economy over the extravagance that existed when it came into power. The casual reader would undoubtedly conclude that $149,000 of the people's money had been spent for the service that now was accomplished for $12,000. Upon looking up the report for 1913, however, it is found that only $64,000 was paid for the transit of the foreign mail across the Isthmus. I called the department's attention to this by telephone, and it was explained that the $149,000 embraced not only the cost of transit of foreign mails, but also United States mails coming from the Atlantic and destined to the Pacific coast. I then requested a statement of the total amount paid for transit of both foreign and domestic mail for each year from 1912, which I received and which is printed below.

From this statement it will be seen that the same item that amounted to $149,000 in 1913 grew to $178,000 in 1914, and continued at $133,000 for 1915 and $145,000 for 1916. The canal was opened that year, but still the administration spent $145,000 for transit mail. It must be apparent to anyone that the reduction in the cost of the transit of mail has been due to the completion of the Panama Canal and this administration can hardly claim the credit of that feat.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, December 30, 1919.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
Chairman Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

[From report of the Postmaster General.]

It will be observed that in the first period, covering the seven years prior to the time the present administration assumed office, there was an unbroken line of annual deficits, excepting in 1911, when a small surplus was shown, the aggregate net deficit for the period amounting to $59,072,909.62. On the other hand, in the second period, covering practically the tenure of office of the present administration, there has been an unbroken line of annual surpluses, excepting in 1915, the year in which the great World War began, the aggregate net surplus for the period amounting to $35,188,879. The net change in favor of the Public Treasury was, therefore, $94,261,788.62. The cause of the change is immediately apparent. Whereas the revenues under this administration increased $737,597,818.12, or at the rate of 50.68 per cent, compared with the seven-year period prior to the time it assumed office, the expenditures increased only $643,335,795.08, or at the rate of 42.49 per cent. The difference between the increase in expenditures and the increase in revenues, less losses, equals the amount of the net change in favor of the Public Treasury.

The purpose of the above must be to cause the reader to believe that the Treasury has been enriched in the sum of $35,188,876, and hence the taxpayers benefited by that amount.

The following statement from the Treasury, furnished me by Secretary Glass, shows the gain by reason of its connection with the Post Office Department for the last seven fiscal years, excluding war revenue, is only $22,966,861.89.

Under the law, however, the surplus or deficit consists in the difference between audited receipts and audited expenditures during the fiscal year.

Hence, it results that if for any reason expenditures incurred for any fiscal year are not paid in that year, the apparent surplus is correspondingly augmented. There is, for instance, now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission on reference under an act of Congress claims for underpayment by the railroads for carrying the mail since November 1, 1916, amounting to over $100,000,000. Should this claim be allowed only to the extent of one-fourth, the apparent surplus would be wiped out.[2]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 8, 1920.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. STEENERSON: In reply to your letter of the 2d instant, inclosing a statement of postal transactions heretofore furnished you, and requesting that the same be brought down to include figures for the fiscal years 1917, 1918, and 1919, I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of the statement you desire.

Sincerely, yours,

CARTER GLASS, Secretary.

[1] Plus expense of handling mails on the Isthmus in connection with their transfer from ship to ship, $4,175.93 (see Postmaster General's Report 1919, p. 13), or $12,773.94. The cost of this service in 1917 was $3,828 and in 1918 was $3,828.

[2] The day after the above appeared in the RECORD, the Interstate Commerce Commission decided the Railway Mail Pay Case, increasing the rates between 25 and 30 per cent for the period between Nov. 1, 1916, and Jan. 1, 1918, and 25 per cent additional increase since Jan. 1, 1918. A computation of these increases shows that the amount due the railways for the 14 months from Nov. 1, 1916, to Jan. 1, 1918, is $17,000,000, and since Jan. 1, 1918, about $53,000,000, making in all about $70,000,000 that the railroads will recover because of underpayment for carrying the mails since the space plan was inaugurated by Mr. Burleson. This, for the seven years of his administration, leaves a net deficit, instead of a surplus, of $35,000,000.

NOTE.—In addition to the postal revenues deposited in the Treasury as above, the sums $39,073,000 for the fiscal year 1918 and $71,906,000 for the fiscal year 1919 were deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, "Estimated increase in first-class postage," and $120,000 was deposited as miscellaneous receipts in 1919 from "Censorship of foreign mails, Panama Canal Zone."

The increased compensation in the pay of postal employees is contrasted with the lower compensation prevailing in 1913, the purpose being to give the administration of the Post Office Department credit. When we recall the fact, however, that the increases, both in the last Congress and the present Congress, amounting to $75,000,000 per year, was forced upon the department by the practically unanimous vote of both Houses of Congress, and that the last increase contained in House joint resolution 151 became a law without the President's signature, it is difficult to see how the departments can claim this credit. The fact is that Congress, regardless of party affiliations, saw that in order to rescue the Postal Service from absolute demoralization and breakdown, these increases were necessary. The Postmaster General now advocates postponement of any further readjustment of compensation until after normal conditions shall have arrived. But it is unnecessary to point out further illustrations of the partisan and biased character of the document. Formerly the First, Second, Third, and Fourth Assistant Postmaster Generals made reports of the business of the bureau, which was published with the report of the Postmaster General. These bureau reports were really annals regarding the progress of the Postal Service and the statistical tables were generally free from any juggling, and the student could here find facts and not fiction. The publication of these reports was discontinued in 1917, and since then the only source of information we have is the summary of the Postmaster General. I fear that if the example of the Post Office Department is followed by other departments the permanency of our institution is in danger. Supposing that the Treasury Department, with its Internal Revenue Bureau, Divisions of Income Tax, prohibition enforcement, all the Federal reserve banks, issuing bulletins at frequent intervals, and the Treasury Department's report itself, should be permeated by partisan argument; supposing all the other great departments of the Government should follow suit, not only their official reports but any other material sent out to the public. A political party once in power pursuing these tactics could never be ousted, but could perpetuate its rule indefinitely.

Suppose, further, that the telephones, telegraphs, and wireless, and all other means of communication of intelligence, were owned and operated by the Government, and not only this but that the Government asserted and exercised a complete monopoly, to the exclusion of all private means, as advocated by Mr. Burleson. I fear it would be a dark day for representative government if such things should come to pass. The people, I am afraid, under such a circumstance, would be more helpless than they are under the most autocratic and absolute military despotism in the world.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. L. S. ECHOLS,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, January 12, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 7158) to provide for expenses of the government of the District of Columbia.

Mr. ECHOLS. Mr. Speaker, before coming to Congress I had heard of the 50-50 scheme of providing revenue to conduct the fiscal affairs of the District of Columbia. Since coming to Washington I have given some consideration to the scheme, and after hearing the discussions here to-day it occurs to me that there is but little, if any, justification for the existence of such scheme. I am utterly unable to understand why my neighbor down in the city of Charleston, W. Va., who pays more than twice as much taxes for the maintenance of his own local government, is also required to pay for the maintenance of the local government of the District of Columbia an extraordinary proportion of the expenses of those who have the high privilege of living in the city of Washington.

It is utter folly to say that the rate of $1.50 per $100 valuation on real estate and tangible personal property and three-tenths of 1 per cent upon intangible personal property, upon a two-thirds valuation, is anything like equivalent to taxes that are collected from the taxpayers of other cities of similar size or even far less in size and having equal or fewer advantages than those in the city of Washington. I assert—and I make the assertion after examining tax laws and tax reports from various parts of the country for a period of 10 years previous to coming to Congress—that not a single city in the United States with a population of 50,000, one-eighth that of the city of Washington, or more can be found where the total tax rate is as low as it is here, and in many such cities it is twice, three times, and in some instances four times as high.

It is just as futile to say that the valuation of property in cities of similar size or even much smaller is not equal to or even greater upon an average than in the city of Washington. It has been suggested in the course of general debate that taxation should be according to the population of the city. Such a suggestion should require no answer whatever. Under the scheme of general property taxation throughout the country taxes are based upon value and not upon numbers. The bill now under consideration leaves the statute in effect now providing for taxation based upon value, not upon population. It is nothing short of absurd to even suggest that any scheme of property taxation based upon anything other than value would result in anything other than inequality and inequity among those upon whom the same might be imposed. It is always wise to place a limit upon taxing authorities, but I seriously doubt the wisdom of providing a flat rate from year to year in any taxing unit. Taxes ought to be levied each year according to the needs of the taxing unit for that particular year, and authority ought to be conferred upon somebody to determine what are the needs of the taxing unit for the year.

It has also been suggested that the city will need additional revenue to support the public schools. The same cry is coming from practically every other important city throughout the country. In my home city now we have three or four, perhaps more, bond issues for school purposes that are being retired by local taxpayers. Almost every other important city in the United States has the same burden to bear; but it is my understanding that Washington has no such bond issue, never has had, and will likely not have need for any in the near future.

The only excuse so far offered, I am informed, for imposing any tax upon taxpayers residing without the city is that a great portion of the valuable property in the city is owned by the Federal Government. It appears to be overlooked that other cities have great amounts of valuable property that belongs to the public and is not taxed; for instance, in my home city we have the capitol of the State, the capitol annex, and a separate building for the board of control, right in the heart of the city, the most valuable property there. In addition, we have the county courthouse, the public schools, hospitals, and other property that bear no burden of taxation; yet we do not go out and ask the citizens of West Virginia to donate for the purpose of maintaining the government of the city of Charleston; but the 50-50 scheme comes down and asks the citizens of West Virginia to donate to the city of Washington for the purpose of maintaining her city government, paying her school-teachers, and paving her streets, maintaining her waterworks, and so forth.

The county of Kanawha, my home county, has there now real estate and improvements thereto that cost the Government approximately $100,000,000, the title to which is in the Federal Government, and this property does not bear any of the burdens of local or other taxation. This amount is considerably more than one-third of the value of the real estate in the city of Washington that belongs to the Government and is used for public purposes. In addition to that real estate, there are millions of dollars of personal property in Kanawha County owned by the Government and on which no taxes are paid; yet the taxpayers of Kanawha County are not asking that the Federal Government appropriate money out of the Federal Treasury to take care of her local fiscal affairs.

Worse than all this, in a recent sale of part of this property, which cost the Government some sixty or seventy million dollars, by some sort of hokus-pokus scheme, the Government retaining the mere, naked, legal title thereto until it is resold by the purchaser, it will escape taxation for years to come, although in fact owned and controlled by a private corporation. And still worse than this, the Government is maintaining, and from all outward appearances will continue to maintain for years to come, a great horde of employees in and about this property to look after and protect it for the benefit of a private corporation. These employees are now costing the Government from thirty to forty thousand dollars per week, although the sale of the property was awarded some three months ago.

In most other cities throughout the country intangible personal property is not relieved from seven-tenths of the taxes that other property is required to pay; not only that, but corporations owning property or transacting business in many of the States are required to pay an excise or income tax and a charter tax that are not required of such corporations transacting business in the city of Washington.

My understanding is that the half-and-half plan grew out of a necessity more than 40 years ago. That necessity originated from a mismanagement of the city affairs under the enabling act passed for the District of Columbia, under which it controlled its own affairs without interference upon the part of Congress. It therefore appears that the taxpayers of the District not only have not been injured by taking and keeping the control of its affairs in the Congress, but that they have been materially benefited thereby and that millions of dollars in taxation have been saved them by reason of the act of 1878. To pay the debt would have been extremely burdensome upon the wealth of the city. That debt is now almost liquidated, and the city of Washington stands far better in her fiscal affairs than perhaps any other city in the United States having anything like as great a population. The necessity for the present scheme of taxation passed out of existence long ago, and, as a matter of fact, the scheme should have been abandoned long ago and an act passed requiring the wealth in the city of Washington to pay taxes in proportion to those paid in other cities throughout the country. It is no argument to say that the scheme has worked well for a half century—of course, it worked well. By that is meant that there has been no complaint from taxpayers here, while other taxpayers throughout the country have been contributing to the payment of taxes which should have been paid by the taxpayers of the city of Washington.

The real estate owned by the Government and used for public purposes in the District, from information I have gathered during this debate, is only about 35 per cent of the total value of real estate within the District limits. The most, therefore, that the Government should be called upon to pay would be 35 per cent of the total revenue necessary to maintain the District government; and the Congress would be extremely liberal to allow even that amount, in view of the fact that many other cities and other taxing units have within their limits valuable public property that does not bear any of the burden of taxation.

It is my hope that the House will pass this bill, and not only that, but that it will stand firm and not allow the other end of the legislative body to drive it from its position.

Some day somebody is going to discover and tell the country why the law providing for the sacred 50–50 scheme can not be modified.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE BLACK,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 16, 1920.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to insert a speech delivered by Postmaster General A. S. Burleson to the annual convention of the National Hardware Association of the United States. This address gives some very interesting historical facts connected with the development of the Postal Service in the United States, and also recites some of the notable achievements of the Post Office Department during the World War. It is a valuable contribution to the discussion of postal matters, and it is for this reason that I have asked leave to print it at this time. The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF A. S. BURLESON TO THE ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE NATIONAL HARDWARE ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES.

Postmaster General Burleson was introduced by President Robert H. Treman, acting as chairman, who said:

"It is a great privilege granted to the membership of these associations and our guests to-day to welcome a member of the President's Cabinet, who has not for the past three years accepted any of the many invitations extended to him to speak and address different organizations. He makes an exception in this one case, and he comes to us this morning with a word which I am sure you will all be very glad to hear. The Postmaster General of the United States, General Burleson." [Applause.]

Mr. Burleson said:

"Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen of the National Hardware Association, it always embarrasses me when I am introduced to an audience, because it makes no difference how much the gentleman who makes the introduction endeavors to restrain himself there is always something said that excites an expectation in the minds of an audience of an entertaining address and there is always a resultant disappointment.

"Understand in advance that I am not an orator. I never was eloquent in my life. I can only unfold to you in simple words a plain story. Consequently, many of you are doomed to disappointment. I was told last night by one of the members of your association that I would be introduced 'as the popular hero of the newspapers, and the idol of the magazine writers.' I made up my mind then that that statement was intended as a provocation, and that I wouldn't fall for it; that I would place a restraint upon myself, and I am going to do so. I am not going to say any ugly things to-day, I am not going to throw any stones, though frankly I have had the provocation, and some people think the justification, to do so. I want you to know at the outset that I have no prepared speech. I apologize for it, but I know you will forgive me when I tell you that I have had no time to prepare a speech. I was told that I could select my own subject for discussion, but that the association preferred I talk about the policies of the Post Office Department.

HISTORICAL DATA.

"When I came to the head of the Postal Establishment, nearly 7 years ago, it had been established 137 years. We had had 47 different Postmasters General, serving on an average something over 2 years each. This statement will excite wonderment on your part as to why the average tenure of this office has been so low. It is easily explained. The Postmaster General of the United States is at the head of a service, the employees of which under his control come in contact during each year with every family in America, and often come in contact with members of these families three, four, or five times each day. What a fruitful source of criticism this affords. In fact, gentlemen, it is hard indeed when a man is serving one master to so perform his duties as not to provoke complaint, but when a public official is serving 100,000,000 people, then indeed it would be a miracle if he should escape criticism. As Postmaster General I haven't escaped, and for this I make no complaint.

"The First Postmaster General of the United States was that wise philosopher and great statesman, Benjamin Franklin, of Pennsylvania. At that time our country was a little narrow strip of territory along the Atlantic coast and our people numbered only about 3,000,000. Postmaster General Franklin had the onerous task of administering the affairs of 75 post offices, with 1,875 miles of post routes and with an aggregate postal revenue of $30,000 a year. Twenty-five years afterwards, when Mr. Jefferson was inaugurated President of the United States, and after he had added somewhat to the territory of our country, we had about 1,000 post offices, operating 22,309 miles of post routes, with an aggregate postal revenue of approximately $320,000 a year. About 25 years later came Gen. Andrew Jackson as President of the United States. He, too, added to the territory of the United States. At that time we had something less than 8,000 postmasters with 105,336 miles of post routes and less than $1,700,000 a year of postal revenue.

"Then came President James K. Polk, in 1845, who again added to our territory, stretching the vast domain of our country from ocean to ocean, and the Postmaster General under his administration had only 14,000 post offices, about 144,000 miles of post routes, and approximately four and a quarter million dollars a year postal revenue.

"At that time the method of postal transportation was by pony express and the old lumbering stagecoach. There was no such thing as a postage stamp. The money-order system had not been brought into existence, the registration of letters was unknown, and the postal savings banks and Parcel Post Service was not dreamed of.

"What a simple task these splendid old gentlemen as Postmasters General had in the administration of our postal affairs.

GROWTH AND PRESENT CONDITION OF SERVICE.

"Since then there has been some development of the Postal Service. To-day we have more than 53,000 post offices. To-day we have 1,590,000 miles of post and rural routes. To-day we have about 300,000 employees in the Postal Service. The aggregate revenue collected and expended reaching the stupendous sum of $800,000,000 a year. And the mails are now transported not only by pony express and the slow stagecoach, but by dog sleds in the icy regions of Alaska, by steamboats on our rivers and lakes, by electric street car systems, hundreds of thousands of miles of railroad transportation systems, and airplanes.

"We transact an annual business of approximately $2,000,000,000 year in money orders issued and paid. We have postal savings banks with, in round numbers, 640,000 depositors with $170,000,000 on deposit, and transported last year more than two and one-half billion pieces through the mails.

"The development of the Postal Service has been remarkable. Its organization is indeed wonderful, and the standard of its efficiency borders on the miraculous. [Applause.]

"This substantially was the volume and condition of your Postal Service in 1914.

WORLD WAR.

"At that time the flash of the pistol in the hands of a student in Serbia, whose name the world has forgotten, resulted in the death of the Crown Prince of Austria, whose name I have forgotten. This shot was the spark that led to a conflagration of war that swept within its scope all Europe (save a few small countries) and nearly all of Asia and Africa. After this war had been in progress nearly three years, what a condition confronted the world! Autocracy, thoroughly intrenched, represented by the central powers, one of which had been engaged for 40 years in preparation for war, holding a corridor through the central part of Europe which extended into Asia, affording most advantageous facilities for army mobilizations, had so successfully prosecuted the war that the great Russian Empire was "down and out," Roumania was practically upon her knees, and Great Britain, France, and Italy, the principal allied powers, found themselves sorely distressed, in dire extremity, and threatened with defeat. And then—and I will not go into the reasons why, because they are too long—our beloved country was swept into the vortex of this horrible, world-wide catastrophe.

"What a problem confronted the American people at that time. What a stupendous task presented itself. The Allies were short of food, short of munitions, lacking men to successfully prosecute the war, and practically, I won't say bankrupt, but in great financial distress. Then it was America entered the contest. When the tocsin of war was sounded it met with a ready response by every loyal American man, woman, and child throughout our broad domain. [Applause.] They realized the enormous task before them. They realized the necessity of producing more food, even denying themselves, if the necessity of the exigencies required it. The American had never theretofore denied himself anything that he wanted to eat. But during this war they denied themselves food in order to properly supply our Allies. The great industries of our country, responding to the call of that wonderful man in the White House, overnight, as it were, reorganized themselves, going upon a war footing from a peace basis, in order to furnish the requisite sinews of war.

EFFECT OF WAR ON POSTAL SERVICE.

"Of course this sudden action was demoralizing from the standpoint of business efficiency. It could have but one result. Every business man in America had his business disarranged, and nobody knows this better than this splendid body representing one of the great industries of our country. Every household in America was disturbed. It could not be avoided.

"Are you surprised, then, that there should have been a slight disturbance in the postal service? Think for a moment what happened when it became necessary to organize that wonderful army that we afterwards transported across the seas. Of the hundreds of thousands of trained postal experts that were in the service of the Government, tens of thousands of them instantly responded to the call to arms and were carried into and made part of that great army. Thousands more of these efficient postal employees were taken from their accustomed places and placed in cantonments and in naval divisions in order that we might give our soldiers who were going to offer their lives in the great conflict adequate postal service. So demoralized and disturbed were conditions in this country at that time that the railroad systems of America, the greatest and most efficient transportation systems the world had ever seen, became so thoroughly demoralized that they were practically broken down and had to be taken over by the Government.

"And yet there were people in the country who complained that they did not receive their mail with regularity and dependability. I do not marvel at such complaint. It was natural. It was unjust, in a way, but it was thoroughly human. They simply did not stop to think. Why, gentlemen, just before the railroad systems of America were taken over by the Government the Second Assistant Postmaster General reported to me that there was within one month 97,000 misconnections of mails occasioned by trains failing in their schedules.

"Of course, every misconnection of a train resulted in delayed mail, and naturally some part of the 100,000,000 of my masters voiced their complaint.

"But, gentlemen, if that had been the only difficulty confronting the postal establishment we could easily have overcome it, and we would have overcome it in a very short time. But this war brought about many unexpected conditions and imposed many unusual activities upon all the departments of our Government.

ASSISTANCE EXTENDED TO OTHER DEPARTMENTS.

"Unfortunately, the postal establishment was the only department of the Government that had an organization that was nation wide in its scope, and in consequence of this fact we were constantly appealed to by other departments to assume part of burdens that properly belonged to them. The State Department had unusual duties to perform, and it called upon the Postal Department to detail to its assistance a number of our most expert men. The Treasury Department, recognizing the fact that preparation for this war would entail the expenditure of billions and bilions of dollars, was forced to float five stupendous loans. It called upon the postal establishment for assistance. We transported tens of thousands of tons of propaganda matter for the Treasury Department in connection with these loans and placed it in the hands of the American people, without address and without stamping. We didn't shirk; we didn't complain; we didn't boast of what we were doing. We performed our duty.

"Later on it became necessary to raise $2,000,000,000 through the sale of war-saving certificates and thrift stamps. A very liberal percentage was given to the Treasury Department for conducting the campaign to sell these certificates and stamps. The Postal Department under the law had no part of this fund, and yet would you be astonished if I tell you that through the postal establishment 83 per cent of the war-savings certificates and thrift stamps were sold? It is a fact. [Applause.] Burdensome taxes had to be laid upon the backs of the people. It became necessary to distribute revenue stamps throughout the country in order that they might be readily accessible to those requiring them.

"The request was made that the Post Office Department undertake the distribution of these revenue stamps. We acceded to the request, and there followed as a result that we not only distributed these war-revenue stamps but sold large quantities of them. Of course there devolved upon the postal establishment, then, the burdensome task of accounting and auditing more than 50,000 additional accounts necessary to be accurately kept of stamps received and disposed of.

"During the war it became necessary to register the alien enemies of our country. That responsibility was imposed upon the Department of Justice. The gentleman who was at the head of that great department approached the head of the Postal Department and frankly said, 'I can't undertake this task unless you lend me the aid of the postal establishment.'

"We responded to his call and in every city of less than 5,000 inhabitants in the United States your postmaster registered the alien enemies.

"For the War Department, when the initial steps were being taken to put into operation the draft act, the Provost Marshal General came to me and said, 'I must have the use of the postal establishment or I can not put this law into operation as effectively as I otherwise could.'

"We again responded, and postal carriers placed in the hands of the men subject to that draft, without address, without stamp, more than 9,000,000 questionnaires. In addition thereto, every third and fourth class postmaster in the United States became a recruiting agent for the Army, the Navy, and the Marine services of our country. All this took not only the time of the postal employees but imposed the burden of additional labor upon them, for which they received no additional compensation. But no complaint was heard from them. It was their duty and it was performed.

"The great industries of our country, when they went on a war basis, of course, were in a great stress for labor. High prices for labor did not always secure an adequate supply. So the postal establishment, through its postmasters, became an employment agency for all of the industries of our country in order that surplus labor at one point might be shifted to where it was most needed.

ASSISTANCE RENDERED IN CONSERVATION OF FOOD.

"Again, when the campaign for food conservation was entered upon, Mr. Herbert Hoover, at the head of that great service, visited me in my office and said: 'We must depend upon the women of America for the conservation of food.

"'I have no means of reaching them. You have the means through the postal establishment. If you through the postal establishment will aid me in this task, I can make my organization threefold as efficient as it otherwise would be.'

"And again the Post Office Department responded and it placed in the hands of every woman in America who was the head of a household—and they are generally the head of the household—the appeal prepared by Mr. Hoover to save food in order that our Allies might not suffer.

ESPIONAGE AND TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACTS.

"We didn't stop there. In addition to all these things I have told you, the Congress passed an espionage act and a trading with the enemy act, imposing upon the postal establishment the duty of excluding from the mails all treasonable and seditious matter, matter that would discourage enlistment and recruitment in the Army and Navy of the United States. It was a most vexatious task, and a very unwelcome one. It devolved upon the postmasters of this country to read not only every American newspaper, but every newspaper (either read them or have them read), every newspaper published in German, Turkish, or Yiddish, or Russian, or Finnish, or Croatian, or Italian, or what not, in order that we might keep the minds of the American people from being poisoned by treacherous and seditious matter.

"The Post Office Department performed that task. It was an unwelcome one, as I say, but we performed it. I was denounced from one end of the country to the other as an autocrat and as a tyrant and as a man who was engaged in the suppression of free speech, as a slave driver, but I moved on in the even tenor of my way. I performed the service with moderation, exercising no arbitrary power whatever, but enforced the law as it was written. [Applause.]

"And it has been a source of great satisfaction to me that in every instance where my action was challenged the courts upheld my action, in effect saying: 'The Postmaster General did no more than his duty.' [Applause.]

CRITICISM OF POSTAL SERVICE.

"These were just some of our difficulties. I can not go through them all. I could not remember them. The things I have enumerated are just a few of the difficulties that confronted the postal establishment during this war. I make no appeal to you, but submit to you as fair-minded men—after the postal establishment had assumed all these outside functions in addition to its regular duties, stripped of a large part of its efficient force, compelled to take on untrained and inefficient men to replace the experienced employees—is it not remarkable that the Postmaster General and the Postal Service escaped with no more criticism than was directed against them? I will say to you for your peace of mind, for fear that some of you tender-hearted people go away thinking, 'Well, what a terrible, terrible ordeal that poor man has passed through and how he must have suffered,' that all the abuse, all the denunciation, all the scurrility, all the attacks directed against me during that period did not lose me a moment's sleep. [Applause.]

"But, gentlemen, I have spoken about a certain line of criticisms; I have said to you that they were natural, unjust in a way, but thoroughly natural and sincere. The great bulk of them were honest criticisms. The trouble was, as I said a minute ago, the critics didn't stop to think.

DISHONEST CRITICISM OF POLICIES OF ADMINISTRATION.

"But there is a line of criticism that has been directed against the head of the Postal Establishment that is not sincere criticism—I am not going to deal in any hard words, don't be afraid—because it is not fair or just, neither is it honest criticism. These criticisms are not offered in a constructive way. They are not made because of any defects in the Postal Service nor in order that conditions might be bettered, but are directed against the head of the postal establishment because of certain postal policies which have been pursued.

"Let no one misunderstand me. I alone am responsible for these policies. I don't try to shunt the blame onto the shoulders of anybody else. These policies are sound. I stand ready to defend them. They will not be changed and there has never been a moment when I regretted their adoption. Whereas I have borne the brunt of much denunciation and criticism, I am not so conceited as to believe they were aimed at me personally or that they were directed against me because I belong to a certain political organization or that I was from a certain section of the country, because I want to say to you that these same criticisms would have been directed against any other man who stood for the policies I have fought for, regardless of whether he was from the North or South, whether he was a Democrat or Republican. It was the postal policy being pursued that gave birth to these sluices of denunciation and the criticism that has been directed against me.

POLICIES: READJUSTMENT OF PARCEL-POST RATES.

"Now, what are these policies? I do not want to talk too long. I am going to discuss them as rapidly as possible. When I came to the head of the postal establishment the Parcel Post System had just been inaugurated. It was still in its infancy.

"There had been a great clamor upon the part of the American people for the inauguration of this service, and yet it was starting off haltingly. The people didn't seem inclined to patronize it, and the inquiry naturally arose, 'What is the trouble? Why is this?' It became my duty to investigate, to ascertain, if possible, what the trouble was. I did investigate and discovered that the parcel-post rates had been so adjusted that in the traffic in the near-by zones, which was the profitable traffic, the Post Office Department participated but little, but in the far-away zones, where the traffic was unprofitable, the burden was thrown almost entirely upon the postal establishment. Now, the law that brought this service into existence had imposed upon the Postmaster General the responsibility of fixing the rates and weight limit of parcels. What did I do? What was my duty? I readjusted those rates. I increased the weight limit. Under the readjustment the postal establishment participated in the profitable traffic in the near-by zones, and a part of the burden of the unprofitable traffic was shifted onto the shoulders of some other people; not entirely, but only a part of it. Why, of course that didn't please altogether those people. Only about five express corporations were affected, but they were not without their influence, and I awoke one morning to find that steps had been taken to wrest from the Postmaster General the power of fixing parcel-post rates, and the people escaped the repeal of that law by only one vote in the Senate of the United States, notwithstanding the fact that I brought all the influence that I possibly could to prevent the threatened action. [Applause.]

"What was the result? Of course, as I tell you, this didn't please certain people who were not in accord with the policy of readjusting those rates. Of course these people voiced their criticisms through the newspapers. If I had been a jellyfish, if I had been looking for popularity, I would have pliantly yielded; but fortunately I wasn't looking for popularity; I was trying to discharge my duty to the American people. Under the action that I took the traffic through the parcel post was increased from 331,000,000 parcels a year to 2,700,000,000 a year, and the postal establishment passed permanently from a deficiency to a revenue-producing basis. In whose interest was this policy? Now, did I increase the rates and diminish the weight of parcels? No; I decreased the rates and increased the weight of parcels authorized to be mailed. Did you ever hear anybody in this country—any transportation concern—being criticized for voluntarily reducing rates? No; you never did, and you never will. Yet those criticisms were directed against me because I reduced rates. And, gentlemen, I didn't do this to hurt the express companies. I pledge you the action taken was taken solely in the interest of the public, and was not taken with a view of affecting adversely any interest. I didn't want to injure anybody, but, if in the course of my duty it became necessary for me to take action for the public interest, that resulted in putting one express company out of business and all others on a deficiency basis, you ought not to denounce me for it, though the express companies and their hired newspapers and magazines may do so.

"Those critics will abide with me to the end. I would not part with them, because I know the only consideration that would bring them to my support would be a reversal of policy, and that will not be done.

"Since then I have reduced the rates twice and increased the weight of the parcel twice. I think that you can begin to understand from whence some of the criticisms of the Postmaster General come.

COMPENSATION OF RAILROADS FOR THE TRANSPORTATION OF THE MAILS.

"Now, another policy—I discovered when I came to the head of the Postal Establishment that the basis for fixing compensation of the railroads for the transportation of the mails had been established somewhere about 1873, and it was ascertained upon what was called the weight basis. The country was divided into four sections, and the mails were weighed in one of the sections each year. It was a fruitful source of complaint.

"The railroads themselves, for purposes that suited them, were more clamorous than others that some change of method should be effected. Finally, they came down to see me. The presidents of 15 of the great railroads filed into my office—the office now occupied, as the newspapers say, by an untrained man without a business experience. And these railroad presidents complained of the service and complained of the basis of compensation, and I finally said to them: 'Well, gentlemen, what would you have the Government do?' I remember distinctly that the president of the great Atchison, Topeka &

Santa Fe System—I will not call his name—said: 'Why, what we want is an annual weighing of the mails in order that just compensation may be afforded the railroads and we may receive that amount for the service that we actually earn.' I said, 'Mr. President, you know that this is thoroughly impracticable. It would be a stupendous task. It would completely disorganize the postal force each year, and it is hard enough as it is now to have the force disorganized, in a quarter of the country each year; and, furthermore, it would cost millions of dollars to weigh all the mail each year. The cost of such a plan makes it impossible for us to consent to it.' One of the presidents said, 'Why, the railroads will pay for it—in order that justice may be had; we will pay the cost.' I said, 'Gentlemen, put that in writing and send it to me to-morrow morning,' but it never came.

"I then said, 'Gentlemen, I want to be perfectly frank with you'—I always try to be open and candid, I put my cards right on the table, never indulge in any veiled words, and try to speak just as plainly and simply as I can, so that I may not be misunderstood—I said, 'Gentlemen, I want you paid for the services you are rendering the Government, every dollar that it is worth.' I remember an illustration that I used at the time. I said, 'I'd just as soon reach into Mr. Rea's pocket' (the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad) 'and steal his watch as to ask you to render a service to the Government for less than it is worth. I want the Government to pay you for this service you perform every dollar it is worth; but, gentlemen, I don't want it to pay you 1 cent more.' I said, 'I am in favor of the "space system."' That system had been advocated by the experts in the Post Office Department for a number of years. We asked the railroads to furnish us certain space in their cars, just exactly like space is furnished in a passenger car.

"I said, 'You furnish us certain space and we will pay you for every square inch of that space.' They laughed at the suggestion. They said, 'Oh, that is an old story. Forget it; forget it.' I remember exactly what was said—'Forget it.' They said, 'You are not going to get away with that.' Well, that nettled me somewhat, although I am of a very placid disposition, and I said, 'Gentlemen, the present system is antiquated, obsolete, and unscientific; you say it is unfair to you. I know it is unfair to the Government. I am against it. I am going to try to change it, and I am going to try to put through the space-basis system that was recommended by my predecessor and the experts in the postal establishment; and let me say to you furthermore, I was on Capitol Hill for 14 years as a Member of Congress before I came down here, and I wasn't asleep while I was there. I know just how the wheels go around up there, and I want to say to you now that I not only stand for the space system as a just and fair system, but I am going to have it enacted into law if it is possible for me to do it.' That ended the interview and inaugurated the contest. I set upon foot the movement for the adoption of the space-basis system before the Congress of the United States, and I was met there by the representative of every selfish railroad in the United States and by every kind of misrepresentation, by all sorts of criticisms and denunciations directed against the head of the postal establishment. Day after day, week after week, month after month, the struggle went on, and finally the bill got into conference. So powerful were these great transportation agencies that they strangled the postal appropriation bill for that year, which forced me to operate the department under a resolution for the ensuing fiscal year. This was the first time such a thing was done in 140 years. [Applause.]

"I felt like John Paul Jones. The railroads didn't exactly ask for 'surrender,' but I let it be known that I 'had just begun to fight.' [Applause.]

"And next year I 'put it over.' Of course, to the critics that had been brought into existence as the result of my action in connection with the parcel-post rates there were added at once the critics that were brought into existence by the action taken in the railroad matter. Certain newspapers and magazines were lurid in their abuse and denunciation. I have no propaganda bureau. You well know that I have no means of presenting my case to the American people through the newspapers, because no appropriation is allowed for me for such purpose; but there were no strings upon my railroad critics, so a selection was made of an unscrupulous little creature, who denounced, derided, abused, and villified the head of the postal establishment for weeks and months and years because of this action that was taken. What was the result? Despite the efforts of the railroads to prevent it, they are now paid on the 'space basis.' It is true they are not paid the rate that I think they ought to be paid, because Congress fixed the rate very much higher than it should be fixed, and this matter of rates is now being contested before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the department hopes to prevail there. Even on the high rates of pay obtaining, however, under the economic methods inaugurated by the postal establishment, under the space-basis system we saved of postal revenues the first year an amount of money in excess of $10,000,000. But I must get along.

PNEUMATIC TUBE SERVICE.

"I found another postal service that had started under very cloudy circumstances—the so-called pneumatic tube service. It had been denounced as a service that was 'conceived in sin and born in iniquity' by one of the greatest and best men of this country, the Hon. W. H. Moody, who was a Member of Congress at the time, afterwards became Secretary of the Navy, Attorney General, and who later graced the Supreme Bench of the United States. From the floor of the United States House of Representatives, when this pneumatic tube service was inaugurated, Mr. Moody said, 'The time will come, I fear, when it will prove a stain upon the postal establishment.' It was a significant fact that one of the Assistant Postmasters General, the year after he went out and the year after the inauguration of this tube service, received a thousand shares of its stock and $10,000 in money. This charge has been made time and time again, and it is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and has never been denied. But, regardless of its birth, regardless of how it was inaugurated, every postal expert in the department asserted that the pneumatic tube was a useless facility; that it was a mere toy; that it transported only a small per cent of the mails; that we had expended millions and millions of dollars for the service, and that instead of expediting the deliveries of mail as a whole it was an obstruction. Now, what was my duty? It was to remove the obstruction, wasn't it? Well, as I had already gathered a goodly number of critics, I didn't mind adding a few more to them, so I took on the fight to abolish the tube system; but I am not going to take up your time with the details of it. The tube service was abolished. Chiming in with the pack of critics made up from the other sources I have indicated, of course, were joined those selfishly interested in tubes.

TAKING THEM ONE AT A TIME.

"I had discovered by this time that in order to succeed with these postal reforms that it was necessary to take them on singly, as a friend suggested last night: 'Don't forget to tell them you took them one at a time.' Recently I used a homely illustration which describes the situation. I said: 'I discovered I was digging up too many snakes at one time; I couldn't destroy all these evils at one time, so I decided on the policy of "digging up one snake" at a time and "scotching" him, then move on to the next hole.' Having abolished the pneumatic tubes for the betterment of the service, I moved to the next hole.

READJUSTMENT OF POSTAGE RATES ON NEWSPAPERS AND MAGAZINES.

"Then came on the contest with the newspapers and magazines. With this controversy you are somewhat familiar because of the splendid assistance rendered to the American people by the gentleman sitting here in front of me, Mr. George McIntosh. He has done more than any other to keep the public advised and posted exactly of conditions as they have existed in connection with the readjustment of the postage rates on newspapers and magazines—my good friends (?), the newspapers, and my great admirers (?), the magazines. Now, gentlemen, accept my assurance that I had no feeling against them. I recognized the fact that they were rendering a great service; that they had been a power in the upbuilding of our country. I have no desire to injure them; but on investigation of the history of the service and the facts just as they existed I discovered that former Postmasters General, my predecessors for—how many years, Mr. McIntosh?

"Mr. MCINTOSH. Thirty.

"Mr. BURLESON. For 30 years have been recommending an increase of the postage rates on second-class matter—the newspapers and magazines. This is exactly the policy I stood for. One of my predecessors was the Hon. Charles Emory Smith, of Pennsylvania, a great publisher, who, when he was Postmaster General, being placed in a position of responsibility, recognizing this grave evil as it existed in the Postal Service, denounced it in unmeasured terms. Be it said to his credit, his everlasting credit, he pleaded for an increase of second-class postage rates. Well, these predecessors of mine had talked much, recommended many times, but nothing had been accomplished. It was a patent fact, made known by a report of a commission, of which the Hon. Charles E. Hughes was the head, that the newspapers and magazines of this country were not bearing their just proportion of the burdens of the cost of operating the Postal Service. On the contrary, the users of the first-class mail were bearing an unjust proportion of the postal burdens. I favored removing the injustice. I was not in favor of embodying in the revenue bill the provision for the proposed increase of postage rates, but I did stand for the policy of requiring the newspapers and magazines to pay their share of the cost of operating the Postal Service, and whenever I believe in a policy I recommend it in my report, regardless of whether it is popular or unpopular. If I think it is right, I recommend it, and then I stand for it. [Applause.]

"When the Ways and Means Committee of Congress, in preparation for the part in the great war that America had undertaken, was looking for sources of revenue (and, as you gentlemen know, they found many sources), they said to me: 'Why not make the users of the second-class mail privilege pay a fair proportion of the burdens of the cost of conducting the Postal Service? They have been enjoying a subsidy for years and years. This year (that is the year the law was passed) the Postal Establishment is burdened with a loss of $72,000,000 in excess of the revenues from the second-class matter, the newspapers and magazines. Why shouldn't they bear a small part of this burden?' I replied: 'I do not want the Postal Department used as a revenue producer.' This is the truth, and yet, gentlemen, that is one of the strings that my critics have constantly harped on. They don't care whether it is true or not; they have asserted and reasserted ad nauseum that I wanted the Postal Establishment to be made a revenue-producing establishment. I invite you now to read my first annual report, and you will find in as plain words as it can be expressed that I did not want a surplus in the Postal Department at the expense of efficient administration; that I wanted to effect economy wherever practicable; that I stood for the efficiency of the service first, the highest standard of efficiency that could possibly be obtained; that if I could effect intelligent economies, that I wanted savings resulting therefrom to go into a reduction of postal rates and increased postal facilities. Notwithstanding these emphatic statements they have repeatedly said, because I developed a surplus, that I was trying to make the Postal Service a 'revenue producer.' I couldn't help having a surplus. By eliminating these useless facilities, these injustices and grafts—because some of it was pure graft—I did overcome what occurred under the administrations of Presidents Roosevelt and Taft when there was a deficiency of more than $73,000,000; that is, the postal revenues failed to meet the expenditures by that amount and the Congress had to reach into the Treasury of the United States and take out $73,000,000 to meet the postal expenses. This sum was taken out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country in order to maintain or continue just such conditions as I have been describing to you this forenoon. Having effected these reforms, what did I do?

PENNY POSTAGE ON DROP LETTERS.

"I begged that the American people be given penny postage on drop letters. But no, political expediency controlled and you were denied that benefit to which you were justly entitled though I begged time and time again that it be given to you. [Applause.] I couldn't help the fact that there was a surplus resulting from these postal reforms.

"Having developed a surplus, I believe it should be used in part to reduce postage rates, but this has been denied you. I did lop off every unnecessary expenditure that could be found; I did cut out every useless facility; I did do away with every extravagant practice; I did abolish every inequality and injustice that entailed unfair burdens on the postal expenditures. And then the howl was raised principally by those whose selfish interest had been touched that the Postal Service had broken down. Now, has the service broken down? Let us see.

HAS THE POSTAL SERVICE BROKEN DOWN?

"Through the newspapers and magazines it is heralded day by day, week by week, that the service is not only 'demoralized,' that it has 'collapsed,' that it is 'broken down,' but that this has been occasioned by my stinginess and unwise curtailments and economies. Now, let us see about this. Do you realize that mail service, daily mail service, is being carried to 13,000,000 more people than when I came into office—5,000,000 on the rural routes, 7,000,000 in the cities, and 1,000,000 in village delivery? Do you realize that the postal savings have increased enormously since I came into office—from 331,000 depositors, with $33,000,000 deposits to 640,000 depositors with $170,000,000 of deposits?

"Do you realize that parcel post facilities have been established with many foreign countries where they did not exist when I came into office? Do you realize that whereas we were transporting when I came into office about 300,000,000 parcels we are now transporting through the mails more than two and one-half billion parcels? Do you realize that during the recent war every postal establishment of every country engaged there was seriously impaired; that every transportation service in this country—the railroads and the express—completely broke down and were repeatedly forced to issue embargoes, and yet the Postal Service of America continued to do business and never at any time failed or refused to receive any matter for transportation that was mailable under the law? It is a fact, however, and I again assert that it has proved itself a marvelous organization with an efficiency of service bordering on the miraculous.

EFFICIENT SERVICE NOTWITHSTANDING WAR.

"I challenge any honest-minded man to make an investigation, look to his own postal experience, and decide this issue for himself. I will be content to abide by the verdict reached. We have subjected the Postal Service to every test that is known, the test of the auditor, the test of the post-office inspectors, the test of the First Assistant Postmaster General, who is in direct control of same. [Applause.] The auditor of the post-office establishment is a Republican, and I kept him because of his efficiency.

"He has repeatedly stated there is a higher standard of efficiency among the postmasters of to-day than ever before in the history of the service. And post-office inspectors have repeatedly reported that the service has suffered no serious impairment, notwithstanding the war, and so has the First Assistant Postmaster General made to me similar reports, and yet the critics say that 'because of lack of business qualifications on the part of the Postmaster General, the Postal Service is in a state of collapse.' I assert it is not true.

INCREASE IN SECOND-CLASS RATE AGAIN.

"But to revert to the increase of the second-class postage rate, when I said to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that I did not want an increase in the second-class postage rate put on the revenue bill, he replied by asking the question, 'You have always stood for an increase of these rates?' I replied, 'Yes; that I was still in favor of such increase.' Then he said, 'We are going to put in on this bill and have the right to your assistance in the framing of the law to effect it.' I assented. And whereas other Postmasters General had talked about it and recommended it, under this administration, for the first time in the history of this Government since 1885, there was an increase of the postage rate on newspapers and magazines. [Applause.] Whereupon I became the hero of the newspapers and the idol of the magazine writers! They have been praising me since that good day and will so continue to the end of the chapter.

AFFILIATION OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES WITH AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

"Now, gentlemen, there is just one other matter I will briefly discuss. I didn't intend to allude to it. About two or three years ago I reached the conclusion that the affiliation of Government employees—and it is true without reference to whether it is Federal, State, or municipal—with an outside organization that resorts to the strike as a means of adjusting grievances was a menace to the welfare of this Republic and would result in a divided allegiance, an allegiance to an outside organization stronger than their allegiance to the Government. I expressed the opinion that the continued affiliation of Government employees with the American Federation of Labor would inevitably result in engendering dissatisfaction, discontent, and unrest on their part and resistance to the constituted authorities and would ultimately result in lowering their efficiency. I submit that subsequent events have more than justified the conclusions I had reached—employees of the Government owe their sole allegiance to the Government, to the people whom they serve. The truth is, I knew what would happen just as well as I knew my name—and I am fairly familiar with that—when I made the recommendation based on this conclusion. But it was my duty, so believing, to act.

"So I embodied in my annual report a recommendation that any law that permitted such affiliation be repealed and that a law be passed that Government employees should not be permitted to affiliate with an organization that has a strike for its means of adjusting grievances. I was immediately denounced by the American Federation of Labor in convention assembled at Buffalo. Next year I was denounced again, but I didn't change my position, being of the same opinion still. This year—and I believe it was in this beautiful city that the assemblage took place—the federation didn't content itself with denouncing me, holding me up as a 'tyrant,' an 'autocrat,' as a 'practitioner of Prussianism,' a 'slave driver,' and I forget the other words used, but also demanded my removal as Postmaster General! I am still of the same opinion and am also still on the job. [Applause.] Thus you see, gentlemen, how I have foregathered my mass of critics—they never tire—they never cease their efforts to undermine me in the public confidence. I have briefly given you the reasons why.

REAL CAUSE OF ABUSE.

"Talk about misrepresentation, about denunciation! Why, do you know they carried as advertisement matter in some of the magazines—that is, in the advertising section—issue after issue, depicting me as a man 'without vision,' a man 'without business qualifications,' a man who had 'thoroughly demoralized the Postal Service,' and so forth. Why? You know why. It wasn't the service that was at fault. Gentlemen, it was the policy that made them unhappy and discontented. I want to say now that we haven't gone far enough, and I don't speak from anger or resentment or because of what they have said about me. I would despise myself if I thought I could be controlled by any such consideration; but from the standpoint of the necessities of the service, from the standpoint of justice to the users of the various classes of mail, I say to you that a magazine that carries in one issue a million six hundred thousand dollars of advertisement, that cost the postal establishment for transporting that issue through the mails $160,000 in excess of the postage that the magazine pays, is not right. [Applause.] When you, as business men, every time you place a stamp upon a letter, not only pay the cost of its transportation but you make up in part for such loss, it is right? [Applause.]

PERSONAL INCIDENT RE SECOND-CLASS RATES.

"A friend has asked me to touch on one incident that happened after the passage of the measure which increased second-class postage rates. I don't like to talk about personal matters, but I feel that I am justified in doing so at this time. There are not many leaving the hall so I will talk a few minutes longer. After this law was passed a great clamor went up for its instant repeal, I was visited by committees of all sorts of publishers, and the owners of all sorts of publications, and finally, one day there was a committee of three came in and one of them said, 'Now, Mr. Postmaster General, if you will acquiesce in it—we don't ask you to reverse your position, but if you will just take your hand off and acquiesce in it—we can secure the repeal of this law or the suspension of it.' I replied, 'No, gentlemen; the increase of these rates is right, and I can not do it. I won't do it.' And then one of them said to me, 'We ruined Postmaster General Hitchcock, we destroyed President Taft for the advocacy of this very policy, and if you don't take your hand off now we will see what can be done with the next Congress.' Well, gentlemen, I won't tell you what I replied, there are ladies present. [Applause.]

"But they didn't miss my meaning. They at once saw that tack with the 'longhorn from Texas' didn't go. So within a very few days a dear old friend of mine, whom I had known for years and am very fond of, came, and he took another tack. He said, 'Mr. Postmaster General, we wish you would consent to the suspension of this act. If you do it, we will make you the most popular man in Woodrow Wilson's Cabinet; and my dear friend, if you don't do it, I fear they will destroy you.' I will tell you what I said to him. I said, 'I neither can be moved by threats nor persuaded by cajolery. This law is right, I stand for it, and I do not intend to yield. If you get the suspension or the repeal of this act, it will be over my most emphatic protest.' [Applause.]"

Rivers and Harbors Appropriation Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY Z. OSBORNE,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 22, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, as a rule I do not believe in the policy or principle of Congress transferring its authority to the administrative department of the Government to designate the places at which Government works shall be established or Government funds shall be expended. It is a good rule that the direct representatives of the people should retain that authority in times of peace, and extend it as sparingly as the necessities may require in times of war. As a matter of fact, Congress, actuated by the highest of patriotic motives, during the great World War placed almost unlimited power in the hands of the Executive department that normally rested in Congress. The condition of war legally is not over, and is not over in fact. Its effect is real and apparent in the situation which confronts the river and harbor work of the country. Due in large part to the high war prices for materials and the increased cost and scarcity of labor, much provided for in the last and previous annual river and harbor bills has not been performed, either in whole or in part. Thus we find ourselves with about $60,000,000 of funds unexpended. This, it is true, is not all available, as contracts are outstanding or incomplete of many millions against the large total. With the provision which is made in the bill for $7,000,000 additional for improvements and $5,000,000 for maintenance, I am of the opinion that we will have sufficient funds to carry the work through the next fiscal year without serious default.

Undoubtedly there are a number of new projects that ought in the interest of commerce to be started as soon as we are in a financial condition to take them up. The Pacific coast in particular, with which I am more immediately familiar, is pulsating with activity in the way of opening and increasing commerce with the Orient, Australia, New Zealand, and South America. New shipping companies have organized in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, and Seattle to utilize the ships of the Nation's great, newly constructed mercantile marine for foreign commerce. Considerable increases in the harbors of the Pacific coast and other projects are really very much needed at present, and should be taken up with as little delay as possible.

The Pacific Coast States west of the Rocky Mountains now comprise the most promising assurance for the future of any part of the United States. Our public lands east of the Rocky Mountains have all been taken up and are occupied by farmers. West of the Rocky Mountains there still remain very large tracts that, when they have been provided with water, will offer homes to thousands. The State of California alone, which now has less than 3,000,000 people, is easily capable of sustaining a population of 10,000,000. With the development and distribution of water which is possible, and with its enormous resources of minerals, the territory west of the Rocky Mountains may quite possibly in the future sustain a population as great as that of the Atlantic Seaboard States.

Much has been said in the course of this debate as to the action of the so-called "steering committee" of the House. I have not been so much influenced in my judgment by that committee as I have by the tone of the press throughout the country, evidently voicing the general opinion of the people. As I read the great newspaper press, including what are called the country papers, I am convinced that there is a very general desire that taxes should be reduced from the extremely high figure at which they are now placed. In view of the representations of the able Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carter Glass, it appears that the estimates for the conduct of the Government for the next fiscal year amount to about $9,000,000,000 as against a tax estimate of $6,000,000,000, leaving a deficit of something like $3,000,000,000. It behooves us, therefore, to look well to our expenditures, and either bring them within our resources or as near them as possible. That would be the course of any prudent man in his individual expenditures.

Further, we can not reduce the taxes without denying ourselves as a Nation some of the things that we would like to do or that it might, indeed, be profitable to do. The first thing necessary is to take an account of stock and find just where we actually stand. The tone of the newspaper press of the country on the subject of special economy this year is fairly reflected in the following editorial in a recent issue of the San Francisco Chronicle:

It has been agreed by Republican leaders in Congress that the department estimate of expenses for the next fiscal year must be reduced by at least a billion dollars. That is good so far as it goes, but a $2,000,000,000 reduction would be better.

It should be understood that there can be no retrenchment without depriving ourselves of some things which we should like to have. Until there is a final settlement of our war affairs and all bills paid, and we get some idea of the solvency, or want of it, of the nations indebted to us, we should prepare to go without some things which we really desire. When we have found out just where we stand, we shall know what we can afford.

In some of the services created during the war, or greatly enlarged, there are already more employees than there is work for. Those and all other evidently unnecessary expenditures should be cut off as a matter of course. But there are things outside the strictly unnecessary class which must of necessity be postponed. The leader of the House names rivers and harbors and public buildings as in that class. It is easy to extend the list. There are activities of the Department of Agriculture which we could dispense with, and the construction of warships could be greatly reduced.

I have listened with great interest to the strictures that have been placed by several Members on the floor upon the supposed ruthless methods of the "steering committee." As I listened to the eloquent denunciations of the supposedly arbitrary acts of that committee, I might have been persuaded that some great outrage had been committed had I not reflected that I had been present at the conference between the steering committee and members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and recalled that there had been none of the ruthless violence described. In fact, I recall no threats and nothing more severe than persuasive arguments advanced by some of the gentlemen on the committee as to why it was necessary that Congress should show good faith in reducing the taxes of the country and that all appropriating committees would do well to bear the condition of the taxpayers in mind. One can hardly associate the well-modulated and gentle, but forceful, arguments of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] with anything in the way of undue aggression. Even the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who has gained no great reputation for gentleness in debate, where each warrior fights according to his own methods, and where the gentleman from Illinois is much more inclined to use the battle-ax and the heavier arms than to apply the weapons of a lighter caliber—even he, far from using the harsh methods which the remarks of gentlemen would indicate, confined himself to persuasive appeals, resorting to nothing that might be construed as coercive or threatening. The members of the steering committee seemed to be acting simply as a body of gentlemen deeply concerned in the successful handling of difficult financial questions of great importance to the country, presenting their views to a committee having in charge an important piece of legislation.

I feel that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, by curtailing new appropriations for a few months until the country can determine its financial situation without serious detriment to the great works of harbor improvement that are in its charge because of the large unexpended balances on hand, has performed a commendable service to the House and to the country. Their recommendations at future sessions for a resumption of adequate provision for the inestimably important work of river and harbor improvement for the benefit of foreign and domestic commerce will have greater weight with the country than they would have had should we have disregarded the obvious necessity of special economy at this particular time.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HORACE M. TOWNER,

OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, January 17, 1920.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an address delivered by my colleague, Mr. SWEET, recently before the posts here and the soldiers of the Walter Reed Hospital regarding the war-risk insurance act.

Mr. SWEET spoke as follows:

"Mr. Chairman, gentlemen of the Senate and House, members of the American Legion, and soldier boys from Walter Reed Hospital, I have listened with unusual interest to the statements and the speeches that have been made this evening.

"We are now passing through a reconstruction period following a mighty war. Many unusual problems confront us as a nation and a people. Many questions are demanding immediate solution. There is universal unrest throughout the country. Production has failed to keep up with consumption. The cost of living is mounting higher and higher. The purchasing power of the dollar is less than one-half of what it was prior to the war. Labor and capital are contending for supremacy. The railway problem must be solved. They must be unscrambled, if possible. The lawless, the I. W. W., the anarchists, the Bolshevists, and the reds, the enemies of our form of government, must be taken care of by proper legislation. This element must be stamped out by force, if need be. America must not be the breeding ground for this type and character of men. They must understand that every true American has respect for the Constitution and the laws enacted thereunder and is in favor of law and order. Let them understand once for all that America is for Americans. And when I say Americans I mean native and naturalized Americans, who are in harmony with the fundamentals of our institutions and in accord with the spirit and genius of our civilization.

"While we are engrossed with these mighty problems we must not forget those who took part in the great war—those who left their homes and loved ones; those who left their business to the care and keeping of their friends; those who went across 3,000 miles of sea to vindicate the honor and integrity of our Government; those who defended the flag on foreign soil; those who gave their very lifeblood and endured the hell of battle that our cause might be triumphant.

"What is our full duty to them? The dead are beyond our power to add or detract. What about their families, their wives, and children, and those who were dependent upon them?

"What about the living? What about those who have been maimed, their bodies torn by shot and shell, or perhaps ravished by disease; those who are resting to-night upon beds of pain?

"What can we do for them? What should we do for them as a grateful people, remembering the sacrifices they made, the hardships they endured, and the dangers they encountered? What can we do to show our gratitude?

"Some one has said that 'Gratitude is the fairest flower that sheds its perfume in the heart.'

"I say to you to-night that a nation that will not defend its defenders and protect its protectors is a disgrace to the map of the world.

"Some have advocated giving them land on easy terms. Some have advocated loaning them money at a low rate of interest and for a long period of time. Some have proposed that they be given a bonus. Some have advocated that they be paid at the rate of $30 per month for every month they served and fractional part thereof.

"All these plans have their advocates and are good as far as they go, but none of them, it seems to me, meets the immediate needs of the disabled soldiers and those dependent upon them for sustenance, clothing, and support.

"On October 6, 1917, Congress enacted the war-risk insurance act. The bill is divided into four parts: Title I relates to the organization of the bureau; Title II relates to allotments and family allowances; Title III relates to compensation to be paid in case of death or disability; Title IV relates to insurance payable in case of death or total disability.

"The objects and purposes of the act were to take care of the families of the soldiers, sailors, and marines, their wives, children, and those who were dependent upon them while they were fighting the battles of the Republic. It was war legislation. This is the first time in the history of the Nation that legislation of this character has been enacted prior to the close of a war. Our pension legislation has always been enacted after the war.

"Now that the war is over, what can be done to make the war-risk insurance law meet the immediate demands and needs of the disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines and their dependents?

"The allotment and family allowance features will soon become inoperative, for they relate solely to war conditions.

"The compensation features should be amended to meet the existing conditions: First, as to the condition of disabled soldiers, as measured by their earning capacity in civil occupations; second, to meet the ever-increasing cost of living.

"The insurance features should be liberalized and made more attractive.

"The organization and management of the bureau should be made more efficient.

"On September 13 the House passed a bill amending and modifying the war-risk insurance act, keeping in mind at all times the immediate and imperative demands of the disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines and their dependents.

"In this bill compensation for disabled soldiers was almost trebled. Under the present law a soldier without dependents receives for total temporary disability not to exceed $30 per month.

"Under the bill passed by the House, he will receive $80 per month. If he has a wife and children he will receive more than that.

"The compensation features of the bill are made retroactive, and if it is passed by the Senate in its present form the Government will immediately pay to disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines over $14,000,000 in accordance with this phase of the bill.

"It has been reported to me that in many instances disabled soldiers are borrowing money from the Red Cross and their relatives and friends in order that they may have sufficient funds to tide them over until the bill becomes a law. They simply can not exist on the compensation they are now receiving. It is not a theory that confronts them, but cold hard facts. In justice, this legislation should be immediately passed by the Senate.

"The bill passed the House by a unanimous vote. The compensation features of the bill have met with almost universal approval by disabled soldiers throughout the country. Thousands of letters have been written to Congressmen and Senators voicing their approval. The bill has met with the enthusiastic support of the whole press of the country.

"Not only that, the American Legion in convention assembled at Minneapolis, on November 10, 11, and 12, gave it their unanimous indorsement. The legion also suggested that a number of important amendments be added to the bill, and especially one making yearly renewable term insurance payable in a lump sum or 36 equal installments, at the option of the insured.

"Senator SMOOT in his remarks to-night has stated that he will do all in his owner to have the bill passed by the Senate as soon as possible, and I am sure that the Senator means just what he says.

"The United States Senate during the last four months has been considering unusual questions. Those of prime importance have been the peace treaty, the League of Nations, and the railroad bill.

"If this bill were now a law, we would not be listening to statements and complaints from the boys at Walter Reed Hospital to-night. They would be receiving the compensation to which they are justly entitled.

"There is nothing nobler, nothing grander in this world, than to alleviate suffering. In my judgment, there would be nothing nobler, nothing grander, for the United States Senate to do than to make the soldiers of the Republic a Christmas present by passing this bill immediately.

"And when I speak of Christmas it reminds me of a story. In a certain city in one of the Southern States people were lined up one morning in front of an express office. It was just before Christmas, and they were receiving the packages that thoughtful friends had sent them. The white people were waited on first, and in due time the colored people received their packages. Among the colored people was an old, gray-haired darkey, and when he received his package he placed it carefully and caressingly under his coat and walked away, his countenance wreathed in smiles. After he had walked along about half a block in some unexplainable way he dropped the package, and the bottle was broken and the contents ran out upon the walk. The old darkey stood still for a moment as if in bewilderment. Then fully realizing what had happened, he exclaimed with great earnestness, 'Oh, Lord, Christmas am came and went.'

"I trust, gentlemen, that the inaction of the American Senate with reference to this legislation will not place the disabled soldiers of the Republic in the position of the old darkey, so that they can truthfully say, 'Oh, Lord, Christmas am came and went.'

"Gentlemen, during this period of reconstruction let us keep pace with the march of events and the demands of the hour.

"Let us honor ourselves by honoring those who honored the Nation and mankind everywhere in the greatest struggle of all the ages.

"Gentlemen, I thank you."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR B. ROUSE,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 13, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 11578) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, the Postal Service is the largest public service in the world. Its revenues during the fiscal year 1920 will amount to approximately $400,000,000. The growth of the service is phenomenal. The increase in the gross receipts at the 50 largest post offices, which represent approximately 50 per cent of the total postal receipts, surpasses that of any period in the history of the service. During the months of October, November, and December, 1919, the receipts of the 50 largest post offices show an increase over the corresponding period of 1918 of over 10½ per cent, and to this should be added 17.07 per cent, because during 1918 the increased postal rates were in effect on first-class matter and the increase amounted to 17.07 per cent of the total revenue. I will insert in these remarks a report from the 50 largest post offices, also reports from Chicago and New York for the months of October, November, and December, 1919, as compared with the same months of 1918. Chicago's increased receipts were 17.86 per cent and those of New York were 12.42 per cent.

More than 300,000 persons are employed in the handling of the mails. Because of its organization, which is national in scope, the Postal Service was called upon during the war to perform many additional functions for other branches of the Government, some of which were:

The establishment and maintenance of mail service for the military forces in the United States and abroad.

Control and operation of the telephones and telegraphs.

The handling of tens of thousands of tons of mail for the various war agencies.

Administration of the espionage and trading-with-the-enemy acts, the purpose of which was to prevent the use of the mails in disseminating matter calculated to incite disloyalty and sedition against the United States Government during the war.

The registration of enemy aliens and the listing of enemy-owned property by postmasters.

The reporting of disloyal utterances.

The use of post-office inspectors in furnishing information to the intelligence services of the Army and Navy and to the Departments of State and Justice.

The distribution of millions of questionnaires of the first and second selective drafts. The successful conduct of the war rendered it necessary that these questionnaires be quickly dispatched. These questionnaires had to be handled five times. This imposed upon the postal establishment a tremendous volume of mail and a grave responsibility for the quick and efficient distribution thereof. It was accomplished to the entire satisfaction of the War Department.

The use of post offices as recruiting agencies for the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and as employment agencies for the Department of Justice.

The issuing of export licenses and furnishing income-tax information at post offices.

The use of post-office lobbies for posting public bulletins as to various war measures and activities.

The use of the postal organization in connection with the nation-wide fuel and food conservation campaign; also in connection with the sale of Liberty and Victory bonds, war saving, thrift, and revenue stamps, and practically every other activity and patriotic endeavor intended to aid in successfully prosecuting the war.

Postmasters and postal employees generally have responded cheerfully to these numerous demands upon and extraneous duties required of them, evidencing at all times a noteworthy spirit of loyalty and patriotism. The Postal Service as a whole is credited with 83 per cent of the total amount of sales of war saving stamps.

Notwithstanding these many additional burdens of the war, efficient postal service was maintained in the United States, while in the other countries involved in the war their service practically broke down. The service rendered in this country has attracted attention throughout the world, and I am informed that representatives of four different Governments have recently visited the United States for the sole purpose of making a study of our Postal Service and to familiarize themselves with the method of handling the mails and the service rendered in this country. They were loud in their praise of our Postal Service.

During the Christmas period just past the number of parcels exceeded all expectations, but, notwithstanding this fact, they were handled promptly and in a manner which reflects great credit on the personnel of the Postal Service. The telegraphic reports received by the department, and which have been examined by me, show that the immense volume of mail was moved with celerity and dispatch at all times, and with little or no congestion, as was shown by the reports received from some of the offices which I will insert herewith.

There is no service in the world whose employees are more loyal, faithful, and patriotic than those of the Postal Service. I am proud to be able to say that I have a personal acquaintance with over 95 per cent of the postal employees of my district, and I believe that their equal could not be found anywhere. Many of these employees continued in the service throughout the war at a personal sacrifice when they could have, no doubt, obtained positions on the outside at increased compensation. Not only did they render efficient postal service but they subscribed liberally for Liberty bonds, war-saving stamps, and other war activities.

A reading of the annual report of the Postmaster General shows the great progress that the service has made during the past six years. Its achievements are such that we all may feel proud. The credit for the accomplishments is due to a very large extent to the faithfulness and efficiency of the men who administer the service.

Congress recognizes the fact that the cost of living has increased materially, and has increased the compensation of these employees from time to time, and the bill now under consideration by the House would continue these increases during the next fiscal year unless changed by law. The committee has shown by its action that it appreciates the valuable service being rendered the public, and I trust that the House will show its appreciation by the approval of the recommendation of the committee. The salaries of the postal employees should be readjusted on a fair and equitable basis, and the commission authorized by Congress for this purpose and of which I have the honor to be a member is prosecuting its labors, and I hope that when it is finished and its conclusions reached that the classification of salaries will be such as to give justice and credit to the postal employees, who are rendering an invaluable service to the public, their Government, and their country.

223 Society for Savings Building, Cleveland, Ohio.

DEAR MR. EMERSON: Confirming our conversation of yesterday, we are attaching herewith an article on the Cuyahoga Valley, the local section within Cleveland, in relation to river straightening, street car service, and the Union Freight Terminal for this district.

The Union Freight Terminal is assured and in the ordinance passed by the council some time ago, and will be taken care of and constructed without cost to the city by the Van Sweringen people, should their project be approved.

Street car service: Ordinance for this service on the flats has been passed by the council and has been signed by the mayor. We are assured that work will be begun in the spring, and that some time during the coming year we will have this service on the flats.

River straightening: We are sure that you appreciate the large amount of local preliminary work that has been done on this project, and the various meetings that have carried route No. 2 successfully through the city plan commission, the city council, the county commissioners, and other organizations of this city.

To give you the further information desired when talking with you yesterday we are attaching herewith the names of prominent manufacturers, and the number of their employees, on the West Third Street section and the Scranton Road section of the Cuyahoga Valley, or Flats. These prominent manufacturers total 17,592 employees, and it is estimated there are 10,000 employees more than this in various sections of the flats to the mouth of the river.

You can appreciate it is hard for our committee to see everyone, but in the cases of those on this list, they were all personally solicited and supported the projects covered in the above portion of our letter. In fact, at one meeting with the mayor we had over 60 representative manufacturers, who appeared before him for these improvements in the valley.

We are also attaching a letter from the chamber of commerce, dated December 22, giving the tonnage up the river, and also on a separate sheet the railroad freight tonnage in and out of the valley. You will notice from the chamber letter, signed by Mr. Thomas W. Fletcher, assistant industrial commissioner, that the figures given on the tonnage for the river show only the movement up the river, and during the next few days we hope to place in your hands the movement down the river.

We are sure that the figures in all these cases will be very striking and show a volume much greater than any individual would appreciate, and can only ask you to consider what it will mean to Cleveland in having our river straightened to encourage a greater tonnage, as manufacturing establishments will be developed all along the river after the improvement is once determined.

We again wish to say, Mr. EMERSON, that we are all appreciative of the good and honest effort you are making, and sincerely hope that you will get some good, substantial appropriation during this session.

Very truly, yours,

THE PECK, STOW & WILCOX CO.

Hon. H. I. EMERSON,
223 Society for Savings Building, Cleveland, Ohio.

DEAR MR. EMERSON: In reading over the writer's sketch of the valley which is inclosed with our other letter of to-day, we believe the figures at to-day's increased employment and higher values would mean that there are approximately 27,000 people employed on the flats, with an annual pay roll at somewhere from $35,000,000 to $50,000,000.

We also believe that the industrial investment in this section would easily run in the neighborhood of $60,000,000 at the present time.

Of course, you appreciate that these figures are estimated, as it would take a good deal of time to get them accurate. In fact, we might say it would take a year or more; but our estimate is so close as to be usable for anything you wish.

With kind regards, we are,

Very truly, yours,

THE PECK, STOW & WILCOX CO.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, March 6, 1919.

Several months ago there was organized in the Cuyahoga Valley, or better known as the "Flats," the Cuyahoga Valley Business Association, comprising manufacturers and others doing business in this section of the city. This was brought about from the fact that for some time many of us have been giving consideration to the necessities of this section to properly continue the employment of labor and carry on business in competition with plants making similar products, or goods more favorably located in other cities free from hazards of floods and with proper transportation to the factories for their employees.

To properly continue and progress in competition with such plants in other cities and to employ a greater amount of labor in the years to come, three things are necessary for the Cuyahoga Valley: River straightening, street car service, and a union freight terminal station. In years gone by petitions have been signed for street car service but never concluded toward securing the service.

River straightening has also been talked of in the statehouse, in our city hall, and courthouse, but never developed to a conclusion. Meetings and conferences on river straightening finally wear themselves out without the proper result. Some of the freight stations on the flats have been removed; others are in a deplorable condition, subject to the elements and do not give proper protection to the goods delivered to them for transportation to cities where consigned.

Some of the reasons why the above three projects should be vigorously followed through to a proper conclusion, actual work started, and service given at the earliest possible date are as follows:

River straightening: This is a most essential civic necessity, because in the proper development of both the east and the west sides, and the proper linking up of these two sections of our city, the foundation for bridge building should be established, and at the present time the building of the Huron-Lorain bridge is affected by the necessity of definitely deciding and taking action on the route which is to be, both for the carrying on of this improvement and other bridges that may be developed, linking up the east and west sides in years to come. Such an improvement has been suggested and approved by city planning commission, city engineers, county engineers, and others in the form of route No. 2, which matter is now in the court of common pleas for the appointing of a conservancy commission to carry the project through, from the view of the fact that neither the city nor the county has the funds for this improvement.

Straightening the river by route No. 2 eliminates Collision Bend, the cause of floods in the upper valley, and will reduce the cost of building the Huron-Lorain Bridge about one-half million dollars. This is a saving to the taxpayers of the county which would go toward the fund of the conservancy commission in taking care of this project.

Newspapers of our city at the time the bond issue for the Huron-Lorain Bridge was voted on informed the public that river straightening would be part of the expenditure of the $5,000,000 approved by the voters at that time. The straightening the river will benefit the west side considerably, for the reason that property on that side of the river is much less than the value of the property on the east side, even miles farther out than any extreme of the west-side section, and our city development strongly going east means that we are building in a lopside manner, while fine west-side property is available both for manufacturing and residences.

To start greater interest toward the west side, it is necessary to straighten out the Cuyahoga Valley, improve the vacant land there, bringing more industries and more employees to this fine manufacturing section, who will ultimately, of their own volition, make their homes on the west side and in Lakewood, on account of the closer proximity to this proposed development. This improvement of river straightening will eliminate floods in the Cuyahoga Valley, will make it a desirable place for new manufacturers and industries in which to locate, and will assist the present manufacturers and industries to the employment of more skilled mechanics and to properly develop their manufacturing plants. The elimination of floods and the development of more manufacturing interests in this fine section of Cleveland, with some improvement, is worth while alone, to say nothing of the safeguarding it will be in preserving the piers in bridge construction, which are undermined and weakened when floods occur. River straightening will be essential in the development of iron and steel industry in the valley, as it eliminates bridges and shortens the route to these particular places, all of which benefits the entire city of Cleveland in the long run.

Street car service: Street car service is very essential for the maintenance of industries in the Cuyahoga Valley for the health and efficiency of the workmen, as it is now necessary for people who work in the Cuyahoga Valley to walk long distances from the nearest street car line, or upper level, to their place of employment, exhausted to a state of inefficiency on arriving and tired out on reaching home in the evening after their day's work and long walk. Business in the flats needs assimilation of certain mechanics in order to carry on business satisfactorily, who will not come down to the flats under present conditions, and who could be better employed in this section if we had better street car service.

In a recent personal canvass are pleased to report that at the present time there are employed in the Cuyahoga Valley between 22,000 and 25,000 people, with annual pay rolls in the neighborhood of $25,000,000 to $30,000,000 annually, the preservation of which to the benefit of our city as a whole, should demand street car service on these facts alone. Several weeks ago a meeting of some 75 people doing business on the flats—representing both the manufacturers and the people employed in that section—met in the mayor's office for the furtherance of this improvement, which matter is now in the hands of Tractioner Sanders, with considerable data gathered for his benefit on this subject, and he is also recording by other methods the wants of same. It is the wish of the people in the Cuyahoga Valley—employers and employees—that this improvement be put in operation at the earliest possible date, and have suggested various routes over which this could be worked out without any cost or new equipment or additional employees on the part of the street railway people, but simply the initial cost of tracks and electric wiring.

Street car service will—in the valley—add considerable to the earnings of the street railway company, if worked out as proposed, as some of the lines which have been suggested to extend in the valley are now traveling over sections of the city to bring them to the square, which do not contribute anything for that service, as there are no passengers in certain sections of the upper levels to use the cars, while in the valley there would be good passenger service all day long, especially heavy for several hours in the mornings and evenings and two hours at noon; but in addition to this, as stated above, there are people coming in and out of the flats all day long, such as salesmen, shop inspectors, people seeking employment, etc. The employees and the employers really feel this service is essential to both and should be pushed to completion and the giving of the service in the shortest possible time, as by the new Van Sweringen plans, eight or nine streets now leading into the flats will be eliminated and a "Y" road from Central Avenue leading north and south will be the only two arteries from the east side into this section. This means longer walks for the employees than has existed in the past and should be recompensed by the proper street car service to properly continue the business and employment to the satisfaction of all concerned.

Union Freight Terminal: The new road will not be able to take care of the traffic and wagon service up and down the hill from the flats, as the tonnage will be far too great and the hauling up and down will be considerably expensive, adding to the burdens already mentioned above. It has been recommended that in addition to the freight service on the upper level the valley should have a service sufficient to take care of its large tonnage of less-than-carload business and not congest the new "Y" road, which will just about take care of ordinary traffic which will naturally have to come in and out of the flats from other sections of the city.

This matter has also had proper consideration and placed before the proper authorities, who have given a fair hearing and expect to work with the people in the valley along these lines. It is the belief of the people in the valley that if the public understood the situation and the benefits, as a whole, to be derived, they would be in favor of these improvements for the further development of our city and properly balancing the growth of our city to avoid congestion, which will naturally come if the development is in one direction only.

Our city-planning commissions should give this matter of growth and development of our city in a more uniform way most careful attention, and direct their energies along the proper lines. There has never at any time been anything selfish in the efforts of people in the valley, but are looking at these improvements in a big, broad way as a benefit to all.

This great manufacturing and equipment section should not be left unconsidered at any time in the future, and organized as we are to-day expect to carry through the propositions now before us to complete success.

All of the matters mentioned above have been canvassed and argued in various meetings of the Cuyahoga Valley Business Association with representatives of our city and county in all the various departments where these matters come up, and in the appointing of a conservancy commission we shall be vigilant, with the judges of common pleas court, to carry through the proposition of river straightening and bridge building with the least possible delay for the benefit of all concerned.

THE CLEVELAND CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Cleveland, December 22, 1919.

Mr. T. J. RAY, Cleveland.

DEAR MR. RAY: I am attaching copy of a report submitted to Mr. Doster on December 13, 1918, together with a copy of Mr. Baer's letter.

Mr. Baer states that the figures submitted are the total freight movement, and that an arbitrary figure for the valley section was arrived at by Mr. Doster at that time.

In regard to total tonnage on the river, the information I received from Mr. Phelps, assistant United States engineer, Federal Building, was as to the years 1917 and 1918, and show only the movement up the river. These figures are as follows:

	Tons.
1918	6,060,292

Mr. Phelps was unable to give me total figures this afternoon, but I have arranged an appointment with him for to-morrow morning and hope to be able to get total figures on the freight movement, both up and down the river, for a given year.

Very truly, yours,

THOMAS W. FLETCHER,
Assistant Industrial Commissioner.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN JACOB ROGERS,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 14, 1920.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article from the New York Journal of Commerce by the gentleman from New York, Mr. PLATT, chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency. It is the best statement that I have seen and a very brief statement of the reasons why the decline in exchange is now so large in the world market.

The article is as follows:

REASON FOR DECLINE IN PAR OF EXCHANGE—EDGE ACT WILL NOT CURE SITUATION—SOME DECLINE OF EXPORTS UNAVOIDABLE—PRESENT POSITION OF EXCHANGE QUOTATIONS—FINDINGS OF BULLION REPORT.

[By Hon. EDMUND PLATT, chairman Banking and Currency Committee, House of Representatives.]

Many of the financial publications speak hopefully of the Edge bill as likely to do much to maintain American export trade, through furnishing the necessary machinery for converting long-time credits into cash for the payment of wages on American farms and in American factories. I do not believe, however, that the Edge bill or any other measure that could be taken will work miracles. In my opinion nothing can prevent some falling off of our exports just as soon as the necessities of Europe for commodities for immediate consumption are satisfied. Nor do I believe that any measure that can be taken—not even a resumption of Government loans—can "stabilize exchange" in the sense of raising exchange to anywhere near normal levels between a country like the United States, which is on a gold basis, and countries which have an excessive paper currency not redeemable in gold.

POSITION OF STERLING.

The fact is that so-called "sterling exchange" is no longer "sterling." There is somewhere a new par of exchange with Great Britain. I do not claim to have studied the subject enough to have formed any very definite idea of just what it is, but it is certainly far below $4.866. The present real rate of exchange is not a dollar or more below the actual par, but perhaps 25 cents or so below—roughly, 5 per cent instead of 20 per cent. That explains to a degree how business can continue to go on in such great volume. The handicap of the purchasers of our commodities in England, in France, and elsewhere in Europe, is not nearly so great as the quoted rates of exchange lead many people to believe. Gold is selling at a premium in England of something like 15 per cent above the mint price, according to recent statements, and that premium is some indication of the depreciation of the present paper currency of England. In France, Italy, and especially in Germany, the depreciation of paper is still greater, and the rates of exchange with those countries necessarily allow for the depreciation. There are other factors, chief of which is the great excess of our exports over imports and the great sums owed to us by foreign Governments, but they do not account for more than a fraction—a rather large fraction, perhaps—of the fall of sterling exchange and of exchange on the Continent. If French francs, normally about 5 to a dollar, are now quoted at 10 to a dollar, it doesn't mean that the Frenchman who buys from the United States has to pay twice what he would have to pay with normal rates, because the French franc itself in paper is worthless and has not the same purchasing power even at home. The par of exchange has changed.

THE BULLION REPORT.

In this connection let me quote from a document which just now deserves a wide rereading, a document to which Stuyvesant Fish called attention in his letter on foreign exchange, published in the Sun on December 24, the well-known bullion report made by a special committee of the House of Commons in England in 1810. That was during the world war of the last century; the Bank of England had suspended specie payment since 1797, and the rates of exchange were running strongly against England, while gold, as now, was selling at a premium, running as high as 15 per cent in London. The committee was appointed "to inquire into the high price of gold bullion, and to take into consideration the state of the circulating medium, and of the exchanges between Great Britain and foreign parts." Before making its report the committee held extensive "hearings," as we should say in Washington, and the "evidence" is printed with their report. A most significant statement of the principles governing foreign exchange is the following:

"That rate of exchange which is produced at any particular period by a balance of trade or payments between the two countries, and by a consequent disproportion between the supply and the demand of bills drawn by the one upon the other, is a departure on one side or the other from the real and fixed par. But this real par will be altered if any change takes place in the currency of one of the two countries, whether that change consists in the wear or debasement of a metallic currency below its standard, or in the discredit of a forced paper currency, or in the excess of a paper currency not convertible into specie; a fall having taken place in the intrinsic value of a given portion of one currency, that portion will no longer be equal to the same portion, as before, of the other currency. But though the real par of the currencies is thus altered, the dealers, having little or no occasion to refer to the par, continue to reckon their course of exchanges from the former denomination of the par, and in this state of things a distinction is necessary to be made between the real and the computed course of exchange. The computed course of exchange, as expressed in the tables used by the merchants, will then include, not only the real difference of exchange arising from the state of trade but likewise the difference between the original par and the new par. Those two sums may happen to be added together in the calculation, or they may happen to be set against each other. If the country whose currency has been depreciated in comparison to the other has the balance of trade also against it, the computed rate of exchange will appear to be still more unfavorable than the real difference of exchange will be found to be."

POSITION OF THE UNITED STATES.

Now that explains exactly the conditions of the exchange on the United States in England to-day, and the principles set forth are just as true now as they were then and have never been better stated. The rate of exchange is not so unfavorable to Great Britain as the published rates used by the merchants would make it appear, because those rates include not only the real difference of exchange arising from the state of trade, but also the difference between the original par and the new par.

By the same token the Edge bill has not quite as unpromising a handicap to overcome as the published rates of exchange make it appear. If foreign currencies can not at present be converted into exportable coin, they can doubtless be converted into exportable securities of value, as well as commodities, and it will be the task of the institutions chartered by the Federal Government under the new act to find those securities, appraise their value, and send them over to the United States, where they may either be marketed so as to furnish ready American cash to pay for our exports, or may be used as collateral for debentures to be marketed. Just how far the American people will go in making investments of this kind remains to be seen, but no one can go among the banking fraternity of any of our great cities without finding a new world spirit, with information at hand of trade possibilities in countries not only of South America and of Europe, but of Asia and Africa. If the banks generally cooperate, as the bill contemplates, and also the manufacturers and farmers, much can be accomplished. But in order to hold trade with Europe beyond the period of dire necessity our own prices will doubtless have to come down.

The National Budget.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH G. CANNON,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 21, 1920.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the address delivered before the Illinois Manufacturers' Association in Chicago on Friday evening, January 9, 1920, by Hon. JAMES W. GOOD be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection. The address is as follows:

An address delivered before the Illinois Manufacturers' Association in Chicago, Friday evening, January 9, 1920, by Hon. JAMES W. GOOD.

"I thank you for the high honor of being invited to address you on this occasion. The members of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association are to be congratulated upon their great accomplishments. In a comparatively short time from a community of farmers and wood cutters there grew up in this splendid State a manufacturing enterprise that is exceeded only in two other States in the value of its product. The last Government reports show that the manufactured products of this State are greater than the like production of 23 States in the Union, and is exceeded by the States of New York and Pennsylvania alone. This achievement is unparalleled in the industrial history of the country and is one of which you may well be proud.

"It is an old saying that 'Necessity is the mother of invention,' but invention is not her only offspring. From necessity has sprung every great reform, every constructive statute, and every great improvement in our commercial and industrial life.

"We are living in an age of constant change in which a healthy rivalry in industrial production necessarily forces the manufacturer to substitute machine power for man power; machine work for hand work, and again and again to throw out the old and install the new. To increase production, to decrease the cost, and to improve the quality is the aim of every successful producer, and to accomplish these results he quickly and gladly substitutes the new for the old. With him—

"New occasions teach new duties; time makes ancient good uncouth.

FORCES WORKING FOR A CHANGE.

"The same principle that has brought health and vigor to our industries is working for improvement in the fiscal system of the United States. A change from the old, extravagant, and wasteful method is a pressing necessity.

"Until comparatively recently there was little or no incentive to exercise strict economy in Government expenditures. There was apparently no necessity for it. The revenue out of which these expenditures were paid flowed into the Treasury from sources that affected but slightly the ordinary citizen. That revenue came through a system of indirect taxation that the ordinary taxpayer did not feel and that did not affect industry except to stimulate its production. Our revenue then came from tariff duties and taxes on tobacco, cigars, snuffs, intoxicating liquors and sources of that character.

"While formerly the expenditures of the Government rapidly increased, this growth did not keep pace with the increase in the flow of revenue into the Treasury. For 52 years—from 1866 to 1917, inclusive—the revenues exceeded the expenditures during 41 years, and only during 11 years were the expenditures greater than the revenues. During this period the net increase of revenue over expenditures exceeded $2,147,000,000. During all that time, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, only $636,554,225.07 of direct taxes were levied and collected, and these were paid by a comparatively few persons. The comparative ease with which the revenue was formerly raised is more clearly understood if we analyze the sources from which it came for a year before the enactment of corporations and income tax laws.

SOURCES OF GOVERNMENT'S REVENUE.

"For the year 1907, which was typical, the tariff duties or customs receipts aggregated $332,233,362.70; taxes on spirits yielded $156,336,901.89; the tax on fermented liquors was $59,567,818.18; the tax on tobacco amounted to $51,811,069.69; the tax on oleomargarine, filled cheese, mixed flour, adulterated butter, and process or renovated butter brought into the Treasury $1,071,067.24. Taxes on opium and playing cards, together with the penalties exacted by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, aggregated $879,915.85; while other miscellaneous items yielded $53,346,713.24; the receipts from the sale of public lands amounted to $7,878,811.13; the postal revenues amounted to $183,585,005.57, making a grand total of receipts for that fiscal year of $846,710,665.49. These receipts were $111,000,000 in excess of the expenditures for that year. This, too, notwithstanding the fact that not a single dollar was collected in the form of direct taxes.

"In 1909 the first year under the corporation-tax law, 52,498 corporations made income-tax returns showing a taxable income; while in 1917 this number had increased to over 232,000. For 1913, the first year the personal income-tax law was on the statute books, 357,598 persons made individual income-tax returns, while for the year 1917 this number increased to 3,472,890. For the next year it is estimated that $3,750,000,000 of our revenue will come through direct taxation, to the payment of which 4,000,000 persons will contribute.

EXPENDITURES COMPARED.

"The enormous expense involved in the prosecution of the war and the burden of debt occasioned by it has brought a radical change in the fiscal affairs of the United States. Now, our expenditures are so large that the Government must raise practically all of its revenue to meet the expenses through a system of direct taxation. Even before the outbreak of the recent war the increase in Government expenditures had grown out of all proportion to the increase in our wealth or population. A comparison of present cost of some of the functions of the Government with the costs during former years will disclose the reckless gait at which we are traveling, so far as national expenditures are concerned.

"During the Jefferson administration the annual expense for the War Department averaged 20 cents per capita; the annual expense of the Navy Department averaged 23 cents per capita; the annual expense of the Post Office Department averaged 5 cents per capita; and the total annual expenditure for the National Government during these four years averaged $1.52 per capita.

"During the four years covered by the Civil War the annual expense of the War Department averaged $19.99 per capita; the annual expense of the Navy Department averaged $2.31 per capita; the expense of the Post Office Department averaged 4 cents per capita; while the total annual expense of the Government was $25.01 per capita.

"For the four-year period immediately following the Civil War there was a rapid decrease in expenditures. The annual average expense of the War Department fell from $19.99 to $3.94 per capita; the expense of the Navy Department decreased from $2.31 to 82 cents per capita; and the total expenditures of the National Government were reduced from $25.01 to $11.02 per capita.

"After the close of the Civil War and down to 1917 the annual appropriations were always less than $1,000,000,000, except for the years 1914, 1915, and 1916, when the largest amount appropriated for any one year was for 1916, and the total appropriations aggregated $1,116,118,138.55. The average amount appropriated for this three-year period for all expenses of the Government was $1,062,930,372.76, or $10.62 per capita.

"During the fiscal years 1918 and 1919 the total expenses of the War Department were $14,854,109,211.22. The average annual expenditure for this department during these two years was $7,427,054,605.51, or equivalent to $70.26 per capita. The expenditures for the Navy Department for these two years aggregated $3,377,915,182.37, and the average annual naval expenditures for each of said years was $15.98 per capita. For the fiscal year 1919 the per capita cost of operating the Post Office Department alone was $3.40, or more than twice the per capita cost of all the departments of the National Government during Jefferson's administration.

"The Navy Department for the next fiscal year has requested an appropriation of $573,131,254.80, or an equivalent of $5.28 per capita. The War Department has asked for $1,128,875,497.87, a sum equivalent to $10.40 for every man, woman, and child in the United States. This amount is more than the total requirement of the National Government for any year since the Civil War and prior to 1917, not excepting the period during the Spanish-American War. It is more than ten times the requirement of the War Department for any year since the Civil War down to 1917. It is more per capita, as well as larger in the aggregate, than the total expense for the National Government for the high-water mark reached for the year 1916.

"The amount estimated as required for the needs of the War Department, $1,128,875,497.87, for the next fiscal year alone exceeds slightly the total appropriations for the two years of the Fifty-first Congress, 1889–1891. Criticism of that Congress on the score of extravagance was answered by Speaker Reed in his valedictory. That Congress was commonly referred to as 'The Billion-Dollar Congress.' Mr. Reed's reply was that if it was a billion-dollar Congress the United States had grown to the proportions of a billion-dollar country. Now, however, we see one department alone requesting for one fiscal year's expenses an amount exceeding the appropriations of the entire Fifty-first, or Reed, Congress.

BUDGET SYSTEM A NECESSITY.

"The total estimated requirements for the next fiscal year, excluding any estimates for the United States Railroad Administration, which undoubtedly will make large demands, are $5,250,000,000, or an equivalent of $47 for every person in the United States. In order to collect even a much smaller sum, the hand of the taxgatherers must fall heavily upon a great many of our people. The result is that from the taxpayer is coming a demand that is both increasing and constant for greater economy and efficiency in the Government's fiscal affairs. That demand can only be satisfied in two practical ways. First, by the adoption of a sound budget system and, second, by the practice in the executive departments of the Government of those homely virtues of economy that successful business men everywhere have found necessary in the successful conduct of their business affairs.

"A great deal has been said and much has been written about a budget system by men whose knowledge of the Government's fiscal affairs is at most only academic and whose actual experience in this broad and complicated field of the Government's activities is extremely limited. No press-bureau budget plan, formulated without a real knowledge of actual conditions, and that is based only upon strong statements rather than true statements, will solve the problem. So, too, those who would have us adopt the British budget system fail to realize that the difference in the forms of government prevailing in the two countries precludes our taking such a course. They fail to take cognizance of the fact that while they are praising the English system English statesmen are condemning some of its most important features.

"The system we adopt must be based upon facts and not fancies. It must be bottomed upon sound business principles. It must recognize that the Government is a business institution, and the same general principles that successful business men have found necessary in the conduct of their affairs must obtain in the fiscal affairs of the Government. It must be an American system adapted to our form of government and in harmony with our Constitution. Budgetary legislation will not meet the requirements of the present or of the future if it does not result in the adoption of a system far superior to that of the British. Where their system is strong ours is weak, and where theirs is weak ours is strong. With a wealth of past experiences upon which to build, we should be satisfied with nothing short of the best, and the best is within our reach.

PRESENT FISCAL SYSTEM—ITS DEFECTS.

"To understand the changes which a budget system will effect, one must first be familiar with the details of our present system. Under the law it is the duty of the heads of the several executive departments and independent establishments to furnish the Secretary of the Treasury on or before the 15th day of October of each year with an annual estimate of the funds necessary for their respective departments for insertion in the Book of Estimates. Under this law it is the practice for each Cabinet official to designate the head of each bureau under him to make the estimate of the expenses for his bureau. When all of the estimates from the various bureau chiefs under a given department have been thus made, the head of that department submits his estimates to the Secretary of the Treasury, who has no power to increase or diminish them and no power to coordinate the service of the several bureaus or to prevent duplications in the service. His only power is to publish them in the Book of Estimates and transmit them to Congress.

"Bureaus under different executive departments doing similar work are thus stimulated in a spirit of rivalry to secure increased appropriations, and so far as the estimates that come to Congress are concerned no one coordinates or attempts to coordinate the various activities of the several departments. In practice this system has resulted in waste, extravagance, inefficiency, and duplications in the Government service.

"The defects in this plan must be apparent to anyone who has made a study of it. Everyone familiar with the practical operation of this system agrees that its failure lies in the fact that no one person is responsible for the estimates to Congress. They are a patchwork and not a structure. As a result, a great deal of the time of the committees of Congress is taken up in exploding visionary schemes of bureau chiefs for which no administration would be willing to stand. They provide for building up rival bureaus, and no one is responsible for bringing about their coordination or limiting their activities. The result is that Congress is criticized, and justly so, for its failure to provide a system which will correct these abuses.

"To-day duplication in the Government service abounds on every hand. For example, 8 different departments of the Government, with large overhead organizations, are engaged in engineering work in navigation, irrigation, and drainage; 11 different bureaus are engaged in engineering research; 12 different organizations are engaged in road construction; while 12, with large overhead organizations, are engaged in hydraulic construction and 16 are engaged in surveying and mapping. Sixteen different bureaus exercise jurisdiction over water-power development. Nine different organizations are collecting information on the consumption of coal. Forty-two different organizations, with overhead expenses, dealing with the question of public health. The Treasury Department, the War Department, the Interior Department, and the Department of Labor each have a bureau dealing with the question of general education. These departments operate independently; instances of cooperation between them are exceptional. Each of these departments is manned at all times with an organization prepared to carry the 'peak of the load,' and maintains an expensive 'ready-to-serve' personnel. A lack of cooperation in the executive departments necessarily leads to gross extravagance. The system is wrong, and Congress alone can change the system. If it fails to act now and refuses to make the necessary changes in a plan that is admittedly bad, Congress will and should receive the condemnation of the American people.

"A budget system under our form of Government logically embraces three distinct steps:

"First. The formation of the budget.

"Second. Action on the budget by Congress.

"Third. The control over expenditures after appropriations have been made.

THE BUDGET—WHO SHALL PREPARE IT?

"Who shall prepare the budget? is a question frequently asked, and one that a group of men commissioned to work out a budgetary system for the United States are trying to solve. The more I study the problem the more thoroughly do I become convinced that there can be but one answer to this question. The President is responsible in the main for the work of his administration. He is the only official in the Government who is elected by all the people. He appoints the members of his Cabinet and subordinate officials. The President, and the President alone, can bring about a harmonious working together of his official family, and to him should be committed the responsibility for the preparation of the budget. To give one of the members of his family the power to regulate and control all of the activities carried on by the other members of his official family is unnatural and unworkable. For the next 25 years the big political questions in this country will center, not around questions of the coinage of silver, or the tariff, but rather around the big business problems of economy and taxation. If this be true, the great act of every administration for the next quarter of a century will be its financial program, and at every general election the electors will be called upon to pass judgment on the economy and efficiency of the administration then in power.

"Of course, the President can not perform this monumental task in person. He must be given a staff of his own choosing, upon whom he can place the utmost confidence, and who will do the work and prepare for him a budget in accordance with his plan and in harmony with his views. Congress must create a machine by which he can do the work. But the budget, when prepared, must be the President's budget. The responsibility must be his, and his alone, and the act must be his act. If duplications exist in the service and the budget provides for their continuation, or if waste and extravagance find a place in the estimate of appropriations as contained in the budget, the President will be responsible if they are included in his program. For that responsibility he and his party must answer in the succeeding election.

PRESIDENT CAN AND SHOULD—SAYS TAFT AND WILSON.

"As to whether the President can perform the work, I submit that ex-President Taft and President Wilson are the best witnesses. Addressing the Select Committee of the House on the Budget on this phase of the subject, ex-President Taft said:

"The President, with the great executive departments under him, and with the dependency of other departments upon the executive department for money, and that kind of thing, is the proper person to say for the benefit of the legislature how much he, with his experience and the experience of those under him, believe the machinery of the Government can run for. He is in intimate relationship with those agencies, and they are under his orders, and that is where the budget should be made. That is where it would be begun, and where it should be put in complete form for the consideration of the legislature. * * *

"Now, it is asked, Can the President do it? Yes; he can do it, if you give him the assistants and the machinery with which to do it. If you give him a budget staff such as the Good bill gives him, and have that staff made up of competent and expert men who know how, he can devote time to deciding questions that are critical in respect to policy, as the budget shall disclose. When there is a question as between a department and the budget staff, as to whether something shall be cut down in the department, the President would be there to act as final authority and to decide. He is there, backed up by the budget staff if he agrees with them, or by the department if he thinks they have gone too far and cut too much to the quick. Now, the budget is to contain, first, an estimate of the regular income; second, of the revenue, and the method of raising it, or so much as the plan of expenditures may require; and, third, the estimates of expenditure with all of it based upon the showing of prior years. It is to be the financial working plan of the Government; it is to be the financial review of the state of the Union; and it will contain the personality of the President. It will contain a résumé of his views as to the policy of the Government in every important field of finance, and that will draw to it a great deal of the Government's policies of all kinds. Of course, it will involve great labor on the part of the President in determining what those policies should be, but it will be something that he has got to meet, it will be something that he has got to take a part in, and, while he has many duties, there will be no duty more important than this.

"In dealing with this subject in his recent message to Congress President Wilson said:

"I believe the burden of preparing the budget must in the nature of the case, if the work is to be properly done and responsibility concentrated, instead of divided, rest upon the Executive.

"No one is better qualified to pass judgment upon the question as to whether the President, with his manifold duties, is able to perform this function than ex-President Taft and President Wilson. Certainly their judgment that the President is the logical official to perform this function is in harmony with business experience and practice, and the soundness of their position will impress itself upon men of affairs.

"There are those who believe that the preparation of the budget should be under the direction and control of the Secretary of the Treasury. In his statement before the committee Mr. Taft gave most excellent reasons why this course should not be pursued. His experience as a member of President Roosevelt's Cabinet, and as President, enabled him to speak with authority, and the soundness of his argument had great weight with the committee of the House that had jurisdiction of this subject.

SENATE BILL OVERLOADS OVERWORKED DEPARTMENT.

"It is suggested by a Senate bill that by divesting the Secretary of the Treasury of some of his nonfinancial duties that the Secretary of the Treasury would be best able to prepare the budget. It is proposed to transfer from the Secretary of the Treasury the Public Health Service, the Office of Supervising Architect, the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and the General Supply Committee. Even with these functions transferred to some other department, he would still have under him the office of the Treasurer of the United States, with 1,400 employees, drawing annual salaries in the aggregate of more than $1,500,000; the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, with 165 employees, drawing annual salaries in the aggregate of more than $223,000; the office of the Director of the Mints, with over 1,000 employees, and conducted at an annual expense of more than $2,000,000; the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with more than 14,000 employees and conducted at an annual expense of $21,000,000; the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which prints and engraves all United States notes, bonds, certificates of indebtedness, national-bank notes, Federal-reserve notes, Federal-reserve bank currency, internal-revenue, postage, thrift, war-savings, and customs stamps, and the like, employing over 7,000 persons and conducted at an annual expense of more than $12,300,000. He collects the customs, and in that service employs about 7,000 persons, at an annual expense of more than $10,000,000. His Coast Guard Service contains 100 vessels, maintains 272 life-saving stations, employs over 5,000 men, and is conducted at an annual expense of over $10,000,000. The Division of Public Moneys, of Loans and Currency, of the Secret Service, of Printing and Stationery; the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury, with all the auditors for the other departments of the Government; the Register of the Treasury, and the Federal Farm Loan Board place upon the Secretary of the Treasury duties for the performance of which require the employment in the aggregate of thousands of clerks and the disbursement of millions of dollars in salaries and expenses, and but add to his other manifold duties.

"Even if the nonfinancial duties described in the Senate bill should be taken from the Secretary of the Treasury and transferred to some other department, he would still have under him almost 43,000 employees, and would annually expend in the payment of the salaries and expenses in carrying out the duties imposed by law on the Treasury Department more than $164,000,000. It is no reflection on the ability of the great men who have occupied the high office of Secretary of the Treasury to say that no Secretary in recent years has been able to comprehend the details of all the duties of the various bureaus and agencies under him. Besides, if he is to regulate and bring about economy in the other departments of the Government, who is there that will regulate and force economy in all these bureaus under the Secretary of the Treasury? When he was Secretary of the Treasury John Sherman attempted to supervise the estimates of other Cabinet officials, but the dissension the plan evoked and the jealousies it aroused immediately forced him to abandon it.

"With such a plan the Secretary of the Treasury would have power to revise all the estimates of the other Cabinet Members excepting the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, while no one would revise the expenditures of the Secretary of the Treasury, and his expenditures, outside of those of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, exceed by several times the expenditures of any other department of the Government. In that department is to be found some of the most flagrant examples of duplications and of extravagance. The estimated requirements of the Government for the next fiscal year aggregate $5,250,000,000, and if the Senate bill was the law to-day the Secretary of the Treasury, who would make the budget, would pass upon less than $1,500,000,000, or less than one-third of the total estimates, outside of his own department. The aggregate of the estimates for the Treasury Department alone is over $1,600,000,000, and under the Senate plan no one is to supervise these and bring about economy in the departments where the large appropriations are contained and where a great saving must be made.

"In his last report the Secretary of the Treasury complains because of new duties placed upon the Treasury Department by Congress, and states—I quote his words: 'That the responsibility should not be imposed on the Treasury Department, which is already burdened with the fiscal and revenue problems of the Government.' If the Secretary of the Treasury is already burdened with the fiscal and revenue problems of the Government, would it not be idle to impose upon him new duties and obligations which ex-President Taft pointed out would in the future be the crowning achievement of every administration? No overworked department official will ever be able to perform so important a task to the satisfaction of the American people. Certainly no official, except that he be commissioned by all the people, should be given the authority to say what the expenses of the people's Government should be.

ACTION ON BUDGET BY CONGRESS.

"The second step in budget making—that is, the action on the budget by Congress—can not under the Constitution be regulated by a general statute. While the Constitution provides that 'no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of an appropriation made by law,' thus requiring action by Congress, it also provides that 'each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.' With each Congress guaranteed under the Constitution the right to prescribe its own rules, it would be idle to place on the statute books a general law which attempted to deprive either or both Houses of any succeeding Congress of its constitutional rights. Faulty, unscientific, unbusinesslike, and extravagant as is the present executive system of formulating the estimates of expenditures, it is no more faulty, unbusinesslike, or wasteful than are the present methods of considering the estimates by Congress.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE.

"All appropriation bills originate in the House of Representatives. Eight separate and distinct committees have jurisdiction over the 14 annual supply bills. These bills are brought before the House at different times and the Members of Congress are not able at one time to comprehend the contents of all of the appropriation bills or to realize approximately what the total appropriations will be, until Congress is about ready to adjourn. Naturally the same division and lack of cooperation which exists in the formation of estimates continues in Congress as its work progresses on the adoption of the estimates. Just as the separate departments working separately estimate for duplicating functions of the Government, so the several committees of the House report out appropriations estimated for, continuing year after year these duplications which are so apparent. It is just as difficult under this plan for Congress to secure cooperation in the elimination of duplications or to maintain a uniform policy as to appropriations as it is to secure the elimination of duplications or bring about real economy in the executive departments.

"Formerly the Ways and Means Committee of the House had jurisdiction over all matters of revenue and appropriation. This jurisdiction continued for 76 years, from 1789 to 1865. In the beginning all appropriations were carried in one bill. The number of regular annual appropriation bills gradually increased until 1880, when it reached the present number of 14 regular appropriation bills and one or more deficiency appropriation bills.

"In 1865 the Committee on Appropriations was created, with jurisdiction over all appropriation bills, and this plan of having all of the appropriation bills considered and reported by one Committee on Appropriations continued until 1880.

HOW CONGRESS APPROPRIATES.

"The importance of having all appropriations acted upon by one committee can be realized only after a full understanding of how appropriations are made by Congress. The Committee on Agriculture reports appropriations for the Agricultural Department; the Committee on Military Affairs reports appropriations for the War Department; the Committee on Naval Affairs reports appropriations for the Navy Department; the Committee on Indian Affairs reports appropriations for the Indian Service; the Committee on Foreign Affairs reports appropriations for the expenses of our foreign relations; the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads reports appropriations for the Postal Service; the Committee on Rivers and Harbors reports appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors; and the Committee on Appropriations reports all appropriation bills for the payment of pensions, for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the United States, for the District of Columbia, for fortifications, for the sundry civil expenses of the Government and one or more deficiency appropriation bills, to supply deficiencies in any executive department.

A CONCRETE CASE.

"The work in the preparation of the sundry civil bill by the Committee on Appropriations in the first session of this Congress will illustrate the labor involved in the investigations by that committee and the conservatism with which Congress approaches matters of appropriations. The total amount estimated by the various departments for inclusion in the sundry civil bill was over $964,000,000. The committee conducted hearings on every one of the more than 1,000 individual items that went to make up this aggregate. The hearings took place in the rooms of the Committee on Appropriations. At these hearings members of the President's Cabinet and subordinate officials and employees appeared before the committee. They were interrogated with regard to every phase of their work on every single item estimated for. They gave the committee full information with regard to the funds which had been available for the prior fiscal year, the uses made of such funds, and the purposes for which they expected to expend the money for which estimates had been made. These questions and answers were all taken down by an official stenographer, and were printed; they comprise almost 3,000 printed pages. After the committee had thus examined these estimates for more than a month, working day after day, a bill was formulated by the committee and reported to the House of Representatives for its action, and the result was that when the sundry civil bill became a law it carried a little over $607,000,000. In other words, Congress appropriated $357,000,000 less than the executive departments estimated for these services.

"The work done on this bill is illustrative of the work done by the various committees on appropriations in preparing bills for consideration by Congress. While the work by appropriation committees has been thorough and the investigations made have, as a general rule, been complete, the plan is not businesslike and can not help but be wasteful. The eight committees having jurisdiction do not work together. Some are located in the Capitol Building and some in the House Office Building. Each is jealous of its prerogatives, and the same difficulty that now obtains in the executive departments in making estimates as to the elimination of duplications is found in the present plan in the House of Representatives by having eight committees on appropriations. No general policy of Congress in making appropriations for the different departments can be applied when eight different committees report the appropriations for the executive departments. Each committee has its own policy, and in trying to carry out eight different policies as to economy the result is Congress ends with no real policy on economy at all.

ONE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS PROPOSED.

"The Select Committee on the Budget of the House of Representatives has reported a resolution changing the rules of the House which, if adopted, will center all jurisdiction to report appropriations in one committee of the House, where all appropriation bills must originate. If that resolution is adopted, the Committee on Appropriations would then be able to do its work through seven small subcommittees, each reporting first to the whole committee, and when the work of examining the budget estimates by the respective subcommittees shall have been completed the entire budget could be presented to Congress at the same time. Appropriations to the different departments would then be measured by the same yardstick. Congress could thus formulate and carry out a financial policy. Around the discussion of the budget would then center the big financial discussions of Congress. On that action taken on the budget would depend possible tax reduction and other important legislation. Members would know early in the session not only what the estimated financial requirements of the executive departments were, but also the position Congress proposed to take on the estimates contained in the budget. It would then be in a better position to shape all other legislation that might eventually require some draft on the Treasury.

"Moreover, general legislation, the subject of jurisdiction of every House committee, frequently involves expenditures, committing the Government to contracts for the future which must be reckoned with in making subsequent appropriations. Such legislation is passed without inquiry in advance as to the state of the Treasury, present or prospective, but nevertheless commits the Government to such additional expenditure morally. No attempt is made to inquire into the Government's obligations already incurred or its ability to meet the new expenditures thus incurred or the source from whence the necessary revenue will be derived. It is taken for granted in this general legislation that, somehow, a resourceful people will be able to raise the money. These unlooked-for obligations make all the more difficult the task of devising a real, workable budget system. They prove the exceptions which disturb the most careful calculations and estimates.

"Just as great economies will unquestionably flow from a proper and businesslike preparation of the budget, so, too, great savings will be effected through a change in the rules of the House permitting a businesslike consideration of the budget by one Committee on Appropriations.

VIEWS OF STATESMEN OF OTHER YEARS.

"When it was proposed to change the rules and divide the appropriation bills among separate committees, objection was made to the plan by the strongest men in Congress. Speaking on this subject, Hon. James A. Garfield said:

"I do say, sir, without the slightest question in my own mind of the truth of the statement, that the scattering of these appropriations as suggested by the gentlemen there will be absolutely breaking down all economy and good order and good management of our finances. It can not be otherwise.

"Hon. Thomas B. Reed said that to break down the work of the Committee on Appropriations and put a portion of its work in the hands of several committees would add to the expenses of the Government more than the Holman economy rule ever saved.

"The objection to dividing the jurisdiction over appropriations among committees was most forcefully put by Senator J. C. S. Blackburn, of Kentucky, when he was a Member of the House. He said:

"The legislative committees are appointed that they may guard the interests of the particular department committed to their care. That is the theory of the construction of the committees of the House, and it is a proper theory. The Committee on Appropriations stands in a very different attitude. Because of no special relation to any department, selected as a fair and impartial arbiter, with no more concern for the Navy or the Army than for the Interior Department or the Post Office Department, it has been selected as the one grand reservoir into which all these proposed disbursements of money should pour, in order that fairly, judiciously, impartially, it may make its recommendation to the House.

"With great experience and profound wisdom Senator Sherman, of Ohio, declared:

"I would not do anything at all to weaken the restraint or power of the Committee on Appropriations. I believe it is necessary, as my friend from Vermont says, to bring all the items of expenditure for the Nation under the eye and control of one committee, so that they may limit the amount of expenditures.

"In urging a return to a single committee on appropriations ex-President Taft said:

"I am bound to say that, under the old maxim that charity should begin at home, that is something that Congress ought to do for itself. In this matter of a budget if there is any method by which any extravagance in Government expenditures can be expanded it is under the system you have in the House, because that same feeling that I have been describing in the bureaus and the departments that tends to magnify their relative importance inheres also in the making of appropriations of money by one committee for one department or for one branch of the service. A man does not have to be a Member of Congress to see that.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM DEMANDS SINGLE COMMITTEE.

"The last Democratic platform contains this declaration:

"We favor a return by the House of Representatives to its former practice of initiating and preparing all appropriation bills through a single committee chosen from its membership, in order that responsibility may be centered, standardized, and made uniform, and waste and duplications in the public service as much as possible avoided.

"In his recent message to Congress the President placed himself squarely upon the platform of his party. He said:

"The budget so prepared should be submitted to and approved or amended by a single committee of each House of Congress, and no single appropriation should be made by Congress except such as may have been included in the budget prepared by the Executive or added by the particular committee of Congress charged with budget legislation.

PROGRAM FOR THE CONGRESS.

"It is a part of the present plan of the Select Committee on the Budget that the House of Representatives shall change its rules by providing that all authority to report appropriations be centered in one committee of 35 members. Such a resolution has been reported and is now pending in the House and will be acted upon at this session of Congress. Certainly the House of Representatives will not place itself in the position of requiring the executive department to clean house and at the same time refuse to put its own household in order.

"Reported in one bill, a budget containing all the appropriations for a fiscal year will give Congress early in the session a clear picture of the resources of the Government so far as its revenue is concerned and the demands that would be made upon that revenue to carry out the provisions of existing law. Around the consideration of that bill would center great financial debates in Congress. In these debates the policies of the administration would be discussed and these discussions would have a reflex influence on subsequent legislation, which might mean additional drafts upon the Treasury of the United States. The entire picture of the Government's fiscal affairs could be seen at one and the same time. At present we only see that picture in fragments and so much time intervenes between the action on one appropriation bill and the consideration of the next that one forgets the picture presented by the one before the next is acted upon.

"With but one committee on appropriations, the budget will constitute a structure and not a patchwork, and the sober business of making appropriations will be considered just as a great business corporation would consider the budget which its president or general manager would lay before his board of directors. It substitutes teamwork for individual play, a business policy for a trusting-to-luck plan, with the result that economy and efficiency will take the place of waste and extravagance in governmental affairs.

"Unquestionably such a plan will be bitterly opposed, but most of the opposition will be based upon the selfishness of men from whose committees certain jurisdiction will be taken. When we consider, however, the seriousness of our fiscal affairs, the enormous expenditures which the Government will be required to make every year, and the heavy burden placed upon the taxpayers in order to meet these expenses, the duty of Congress is clear. Without the adoption of such a resolution true budgetary reform is impossible. Its adoption will guarantee the consideration of appropriations by Congress in a businesslike and economical way. While it means the surrender by certain committees of jurisdiction which they now possess and will take from certain members of those committees some powers they now exercise, we should, and will, approach the consideration of this problem with a determination to submerge personal ambition for the public good.

THE THIRD STEP—CONTROL OVER EXPENDITURES.

"The third step in budgetary reform is the control over expenditures after appropriations have once been made. Ours is the only Government where the law-granting or appropriating power loses control of all appropriations after the money has been once granted. Under our plan the President appoints the Comptroller of the Treasury and the six auditors.

"The appointment has always been considered political patronage, and technical as is the work of auditing accounts, strange to say, as a general rule the auditors so appointed have rarely had any experience either as accountants or auditors. Of the six persons now filling these responsible positions only one ever had any experience in the auditing of accounts. They are appointed because of their political service, and it ill becomes either the Comptroller of the Treasury or one of the auditors to criticize very strongly an expenditure made by any department. Such criticism would be considered a reflection upon the administration of which the auditor himself is a part.

"The Comptroller of the Treasury is not always free from political bias and control, and is not always unhampered in giving a legal opinion as to the use which may be made of an appropriation. It is reported that a former President, while criticizing a rather unyielding Comptroller of the Treasury with regard to one of his decisions, almost despaired of having him change his opinion until he said to the comptroller that if he could not change the opinion of the comptroller, he could change the comptroller.

CREATING OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL.

"The bill recently passed by the House if enacted into law will cure this defect. It provides for a comptroller general and an assistant comptroller general of the United States, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and should be removed only by a concurrent resolution of Congress on account of inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. Long tenure in office is necessary in order to secure a competent man of high standing to fill the position. The positon is a semijudicial one and the tenure in office should be made secure so long as the official performs his work in a fearless and satisfactory way. The auditors should be appointed by the comptroller general because of their fitness for the position and should at all times be under his control and direction.

"By creating this department, Congress will have applied another practical business principle to the administration of the Government's fiscal affairs. Men will be employed as auditors who owe their positions to their training and ability, and who do not secure their position as a reward for political service. They will be fearless in their examination, and can criticize the executives who misuse appropriations or whose offices are conducted in an inefficient manner, without fear of removal.

WILL BE AID TO CONGRESS.

"Congress and its committees will at all times be able to consult with officials of this department regarding expenditures and from them it will be able to obtain the most reliable information regarding the use to which any appropriation has been put. From them Congress will receive first-hand information as to the lack of efficiency in any department of the Government. This independent department will necessarily serve as a check against extravagance in the preparation of the budget. Those appointed by the President and charged with the duty of assisting him in collecting data and in preparing the budget will realize that their every act and decision will come under close scrutiny of the accounting department. If duplications, inefficiency, waste, and extravagance exist, as the result of any expenditure, this department will discover it immediately. The knowledge on the part of every executive and bureau chief that such an independent and fearless department exists, and that every act and deed they perform will come under the closest scrutiny of this department, and will reach the ear of Congress, will in itself force a much higher degree of efficiency in every department of the Government.

"One of the greatest weaknesses in our present system lies in the fact that committees charged with the responsibility of considering appropriation bills have but little assistance in arriving at correct conclusions. The persons appearing before the committees of Congress in explaining estimated requirements are in the main the very bureau chiefs who prepared the estimates. Proud of their achievement and jealous of their power, they appear before these committees to exploit the attainments of their respective bureaus; not infrequently are they discovered in attempting to cover up the shortcomings of their departments, and to minimize waste and inefficiency, no matter how great the extravagance may be. They magnify their accomplishments and often either conceal or forget their shortcomings. They pad their estimates on the theory that Congress will make reductions and stultify themselves in attempting to maintain them. Not infrequently do they fool Congress and its committees by securing larger appropriations than they know are necessary; but when these appropriations are once secured, in order to prevent a reduction in them in succeeding years, they proceed to spend the appropriation for unnecessary things not contemplated when the grant was made. The result is an ex parte examination by Congress, and in this examination, even though made most searching and thorough, Congress too frequently hears only half the truth and sometimes gets an altogether erroneous conception of the real situation.

"Even the heads of the executive departments, as a rule, are not informed as to the actual conditions of the separate bureaus under them. This fact has been clearly demonstrated by the appearances of Cabinet members before appropriation committees. Members of the Cabinet have too frequently demonstrated before such committees that they have no detailed information with regard to the departments they are administering. Indeed, so great has been the humiliation of members of the Cabinet in this regard that the practice which formerly obtained of members of the Cabinet appearing before appropriation committees in the House in support of their estimates has practically passed into disuse.

COMPARED WITH BRITISH AUDITOR AND COMPTROLLER GENERAL.

"The office of comptroller general will be a very important and powerful one. In some respects it may be compared to the office of the British comptroller and auditor general. How important that office was during the war and how it functioned when the British treasury and even the House of Commons failed to function is best told in the speech of the Hon. Lief Jones, made in the House of Commons on October 24, 1916. He said:

"The ordinary control of this house over finance has wholly disappeared during the war. We have no estimates. We have the estimates for the civil service, but there are no estimates for the war office or navy expenditures. The House of Commons has not the control which it exercises ordinarily through considering the estimates. Treasury control has largely disappeared. Both the great spending departments which deal with the war urge that the control of the treasury could not be exercised during the war because of the need for haste. The only control which is left is control after the event, and it is most important, late as it comes, that that control after event should be as thorough as possible and that there should be full investigation into those matters to which the comptroller and auditor general draws attention in his report upon the appropriation account.

"The honorable member for Galway has reminded the house of the great functions of the comptroller and auditor general, who, indeed, is the real guardian, on behalf of the House of Commons, of the purse of the nation. He is a great officer of state. He is not removable even by the Government of the day. He can only be removed on a petition from both houses of Parliament. He is appointed expressly by this house to safeguard the expenditure of the country and to see that the accounts are properly audited and properly appropriated for the purpose for which this house intended. There is no power in the house nor in the prime minister nor in the cabinet to override the decisions of the comptroller and auditor general. He is one of the great officials of this country.

"If the comptroller and auditor general of the British House of Commons is the 'real guardian, on behalf of the House of Commons, of the purse of the nation,' under the law proposed a comptroller general will become the real guardian of the Treasury of the United States. He will become one of the most powerful and useful Government officials, and, in my opinion, more real economy and efficiency will result through the creation of this office than from any other single step we could possibly take. The exchequer and audit act was enacted by the British Parliament in 1866 and remains and will continue to be the monument to the statesmanship of William E. Gladstone. The one outstanding provision of that act is the provision creating the accounting department. It functioned in time of peace and is the only fiscal agency of the British Government that functioned in time of war. Shall we make the mistake of providing for a budget without the creation of so important an office? The creation of an accounting department will accomplish a threefold result:

"First. It will provide for a real audit of Government accounts.

"Second. It will serve as a check on the President and those under him in the preparation of the budget, and in order to assist him in its preparation every Cabinet member will be required to make a study of his department, to the extent that he will become master of the work of the various bureaus under him. Cabinet members will be made to realize that they have not always realized in the past that they will be responsible for the waste and extravagant use of public funds appropriated for the use of their departments.

"Third. It will become a real arm of Congress and will be able to furnish the very information that Congress needs and now works without.

THE BUDGET A BUSINESS PLAN.

"The proposed legislation is of vital importance to the people of the United States. No legislation of greater import will engage the attention of this Congress. More than three years ago the political parties promised it. To-day the people are earnestly demanding it. In proposing this budgetary legislation no claim is made that it is perfect. Time alone will develop its imperfections, and when they appear Congress should not hesitate to correct them. In my opinion the legislation provided in the bill recently passed by the House, taken in connection with the resolution changing the rules of the House, providing for a single committee on appropriations, is solidly founded upon sound business principles, and its adoption will mark the beginning of a new era in the financial history of the United States. Once enacted and properly enforced, the proposed legislation will need no defender. The saving it will effect under a business administration will cause men to wonder why its adoption was so long delayed. As Burke put the old Latin law, it will 'give us a system of economy, which is itself a great revenue.'

BUDGET USELESS WITHOUT A BUSINESS EXPENDITURE.

"You ask what a budget system will save the taxpayers of the United States. My answer is that in and of itself no budget system, however perfect, can make any saving. It may contain great possibilities but it can not have actualities. The savings and economies that can be effected through such a system will depend entirely upon the sound business judgment of the man who in a large measure must formulate our national policy, whose duty is to execute the laws, the man who must formulate the budget, and who, through his Cabinet members, must carry the budget into execution by actually expending the money appropriated by Congress—the President of the United States. He and he alone, under any budget system, can bring about real and substantial economy in the Government's fiscal affairs. No budget system will work automatically. It will be only a system, a mere machine. If the operator desires economy, and is firmly grounded on sound business principles, it has great possibilities; but if he only talks economy while he practices waste there can be no saving. He must realize that a reduction in Government expenditures must precede a reduction in taxation, and that a return to normal conditions can only be effected by the Government adopting a sound business policy and adhering to it. Excessive taxation is a companion of high living costs; they can be divorced only by the practice of economy. The Government in this day should be the exemplar.

"Apparently the Government of the United States is the only great business concern that is not run along business lines. With one breath the Secretary of Labor asks for $14,500,000 to establish employment agencies throughout the country to help our unemployed find jobs, while in another he voices his approval of the plan of the Commissioner of Immigration to bring into the United States 100,000 laborers from Porto Rico and Mexico to supply a labor shortage. On the same day that the Attorney General is seen starting a great crusade against buying anything except the actual necessaries for immediate needs we see the Secretary of Agriculture advising and urging the State highway commissions to buy all kinds of material and machinery for road construction and store it for future use. We behold the Treasury Department urging Congress to accept a generous donation by patriotic citizens of a southern city of 5,000 acres of land on which to build a hospital, and when a generous appropriation is made by Congress to build this hospital we see this same department letting a contract to some of these same patriotic citizens who donated the land. That is not all. The contract is let at just double the amount which the Treasury Department estimated it would cost to have the same improvements made by letting out the work to subcontractors.

We hear all of the executive departments in one grand finale denouncing the hoarder of the necessaries of life and threatening to throw him in jail, while at the same time we behold the Secretary of War, the greatest hoarder of necessities in all the world, refusing to dispose of his hoarded stock until commanded by Congress.

"True, these specific instances apply only to the present administration, but the failure to conduct the Government on business principles is not confined to this administration alone. Lack of a business policy has been inherent in former administrations.

"No budget system, however perfect in principle or complete in detail, can make a business executive out of a person not thoroughly grounded in sound business principles. In the future the political party, as well as the executive official, that pays less attention to politics and more attention to good business administration will win the plaudits of the American electorate.

"The Government of 110,000,000 people is a big business. No other government and no other business concern in all the world is engaged in such a variety of enterprises or on so large a scale. Its activities have grown so quickly, its functions have expanded so broadly, and the consequent expense has multiplied so rapidly that we sometimes fail to realize the fact that the Government of the United States is the biggest business concern in all the world. From the business men of the Nation must come the demand that the business of the Government be conducted along business lines. More and more must public sentiment be aroused to the necessity of conducting the greatest business in the world, the business in which we are all partners, on business principles.

"The Government's real game is not at chess, where movements are for position, but rather is it the great game of business, affecting, as it does, the industry and security, the happiness and contentment of all the people. To secure this the most improved business methods must be applied. The highest degree of business economy must be exercised. A strict business policy must be inaugurated and strictly adhered to. The pressing fiscal needs for the future are for a budget system and a business administration of that system. Given these, we will enter the new financial era with hope and enthusiasm that the Government's business may be so conducted that the burdens of taxation may be lessened and the comforts of life made more the common enjoyment of all."

Compensation for ex-Service Men.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. NICHOLS,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 22, 1920.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with leave granted me, I am herewith inserting in the RECORD, by request, the resolutions adopted by Charles A. Learned Post, No. 1, the American Legion, in regard to the question of compensation for ex-service men:

Whereas we, the members of the Charles A. Learned Post, believe that the maintenance and vocational training and other reconstruction work for disabled service men and the proper maintenance of widows and orphans of those who paid the supreme sacrifice is of first interest with all ex-service men, we still believe that the question of proper and just compensation for all citizens who served the Nation during the late war is also of prime importance to the Nation, in that our future national spirit very greatly depends upon our comrades themselves feeling and teaching to posterity that the Nation properly appreciates services rendered in time of need; and

Whereas there is a very apparent effort upon the part not only of some of our Representatives in Congress but also upon the part of a few members of our own organization, who do not represent the desires of the vast majority of ex-service men, to sidetrack or muddle the question of just compensation by confounding this question with that of land grants or loans for city home building: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Charles A. Learned Post of the American Legion, with nearly 6,000 paid-up members, make known to our Representatives in Congress and to the national executive committee of the American Legion our decided views on the question of compensation as expressed in the following paragraphs:

1. We glory in whatever and all sacrifices we have made, and nothing can properly compensate us for such sacrifices but the heartfelt appreciation of our fellow Americans.

2. For time spent in service compensation is justly due us which will put us on a plane of equality with the men who served our country in home industries.

3. Enemy aliens and slackers received abnormally high wages in our shops, which high wages were made possible by high prices paid by the Government on war contracts, which prices in turn were paid by the issue of Liberty bonds, which in turn have been absorbed by the war wage earners.

4. What would be more just, therefore, than an issue of Liberty bonds, payable 20 years from date of issue, to be issued to the service men at the rate of one bond for each month of service rendered?

5. These bonds would not be a drain on our national finances.

6. There would be no cost of sale of this issue.

7. The payment of $30 a month in cash or bonds added to the amount which a private in the service received would be ridiculously small and considered inadequate pay for services rendered by any fair-minded American.

8. If compensation is due any of us, it is due all. It would be very apparently unjust, therefore, to offer compensation in lieu of a farm loan or loan on city property in that the Government would practically be saying: "If you wish to make a loan for the purchase of a farm or city home, we will not pay you that which is due you," or "if we pay you what is justly due you, you can not have the privilege of taking up a farm or city home, thereby becoming a more stable citizen and greater asset to your country."

9. Loans on land to ex-service men would be a privilege not granted to the ordinary citizen, and such loans would not be asked for by all, while compensation is due all for time rendered in service. Therefore loans and compensation, serving very different purposes as they do, should not be confounded by incorporation in a unit bill before Congress, or by making them optional with the service men.

10. The State convention of the American Legion, of Michigan, representing thousands of paid-up members, passed a resolution without a dissenting vote, favoring a $100 bond to be paid to each ex-service man for each and every month or major fraction thereof which he spent in the service.

11. We respectfully submit that human nature is not different in Michigan from that in any other State.

12. We respectfully request that the above resolution be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Antidumping Bill.

SPEECH

OF

HON. CORDELL HULL,

OF TENNESSEE.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, December 9, 1919.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10918) to provide revenue and encourage domestic industries by the elimination, through the assessment of special duties, of unfair foreign competition, and for other purposes.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of entering into a discussion of this bill at this time. I did not have the opportunity of making a study of the bill or of participating in the proceedings in the committee when the bill received its real consideration.

I am not satisfied with some of the provisions as they appear from a superficial examination. My present impression is that some material phases of this bill are more drastic than those of any other so-called antidumping law that I have any knowledge of. I am going to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill in order to define the impressions which I may finally form with regard to certain phases of it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I agree with the gentleman that this bill is quite drastic in its provisions, and I would like to have him suggest at this time the particular matter that he has in mind. It may be that the bill needs some amendment.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I sought to develop one point of objection earlier in the day, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] proceeded to elaborate on it, and I am informed that he will offer an amendment relating to that phase; that is, in connection with the meaning and application of section 9 taken in conjunction with section 1 of the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Section 9, of course, refers back to section 1.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes. Under the present provisions of the bill we might take any product which is produced only to the very slightest extent and value in this country, with the result that this country would be obliged to import the principal part that it consumed. Yet this bill would apply to and tax that business situation, even though we produced only a nominal amount and there was no prospect or possibility of ever producing more.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let us take an example and see if I understand what the gentleman is getting at. Take the article of tea. Does the gentleman think that under a reasonable consideration of section 1 it could be considered to be a competing article?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Some of the other antidumping laws relate only to competitive products where they are produced in substantial quantities. Now, section 1 of this bill simply embraces all articles that are produced at all or to any extent whatever in this country.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It leaves a certain amount of discretion to the Treasury officials in that regard. I do not think that under this bill, for instance, it would be construed that tea was produced in this country in such quantities as to justify its inclusion in the terms of this bill.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The gentleman might take potash or some similar products that are produced in minor quantities and in such small quantities that this country will be obliged to purchase the principal amount from abroad not only now but for all time hereafter.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that this bill ought not to include articles which are practically not produced in this country, and if it were necessary to modify the bill I, for one, should be perfectly willing to modify it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The bill, in paragraph 1, makes it apply to all goods of a kind identical or comparable with the class or kind made or produced in the United States, without reference to quantity.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Without reference to quantity or value.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think there are provisions in this bill, however, which limit it to articles produced in substantial quantities, to be determined by the Treasury officials.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I shall now extend my remarks in order to say that since the above colloquy I have given some study to the pending antidumping measure, with the result that my original impression that the proposed measure is decidedly more drastic, sweeping, and inflexible than any other law or proposed law on this subject has been confirmed. Existing laws in the very few other countries which have adopted antidumping legislation contain certain flexible and elastic provisions, exceptions, and qualifications which have been found essential to their practical administration and satisfactory operation. These laws present a much wiser and more feasible antidumping policy than this bill proposes.

The Balfour committee in England defined dumping as—

A sale of goods in particular markets at prices lower than those at which the goods are currently offered in the country of manufacture.

The United States Tariff Commission, in its interesting and elaborate report recently sent to the Ways and Means Committee of the House, proposes the following definition:

Dumping may be comprehensively described as the sale of imported merchandise at less than its prevailing market or wholesale price in the country of production.

The commission then very pertinently adds:

The definition derives particular importance from a not infrequent tendency to confuse with dumping ordinary low-priced sales, price cutting, and severe competition of a legitimate sort, as well as certain other trade practices which are generally considered unfairly competitive.

Hon. William S. Culbertson, a member of the Tariff Commission, in his recent admirable book entitled, "Commercial Policy in War Time and After," inserts an instructive chapter on antidumping legislation. Among other things, he says:

"Dumping" is a term which is heard frequently and which is used very loosely by business men. The great majority of cases described as dumping are merely cases of severe competition of cheap foreign goods.

He further points out that the unfair trade practice known as "undervaluation" is by many erroneously confused with the term "dumping."

Mr. Culbertson proceeds to define the three kinds of trade practice which might appropriately fall under the head of dumping, as follows:

(1) A temporary and sporadic selling abroad below the domestic price of a surplus that can not be disposed of at a profitable price at home. It is the principle of the "bargain counter" applied to international trade.

(2) A constant deliberate selling abroad below the domestic price of a portion of a factory's output, since by operating full time foreign producers can reduce the average cost and increase the total profits. Monopoly frequently results in this practice.

(3) A method of predatory price cutting intended to destroy a foreign industry, to eliminate a competitor, or to prevent the development of competition in the import market.

He then refers to the first classification just set out as being a trade practice as old as commerce which "consists of selling goods for whatever they will bring, usually at or below cost." This practice in domestic trade—and it is a very frequent and general practice—is never referred to as dumping, but only when it is pursued in foreign trade is it characterized as a species of dumping. American business concerns have generally pursued this practice in domestic trade, as well as to a very considerable extent in their export trade. This phase of dumping, which may be illustrated by the case of an American manufacturer who reduces the price of his goods sold abroad in order to meet competition or in order to get rid of a surplus, does not partake of the obnoxious or vicious character of the third form of dumping enumerated by Mr. Culbertson. Without regard to the merits of the dumping problem, it is claimed that in the past business in the United States has gained far more than it has lost from the practice of so-called dumping under the first and second classifications of Mr. Culbertson which I have already set out. The Nation undoubtedly has suffered much from the practice described in his third classification. The dye situation offers a conspicuous case in point. Speaking generally, it must be apparent that if the proposed drastic antidumping measure should become a law it would greatly limit the range of bargaining in which our business men can now indulge without injury to domestic industry when buying abroad, but I say this without including the more vicious class of trade practices which the German dye industry exemplified prior to the war.

Many of our industries prior to the war followed the constant systematic policy of selling abroad below the domestic price of a portion of their output. As I recall, steel rails, sewing machines, cash registers, and other staple products were for many years sold in other countries at substantially lower prices than in the domestic market. Understand me, I am only stating conditions, not opinions. The theory of this practice is that manufacturing concerns which produce on a large scale and at correspondingly lower costs find it profitable year in and year out to sell their surplus at or below cost in foreign markets. Under this practice many manufacturing businesses which produce on an immense scale are not obliged to shut down, thereby subjecting themselves to considerable losses resulting from idle plants and the disorganization of their labor. Before the war the German combination of wire-rolling mills and pig-iron and similar manufactures sought to justify their practice of systematic dumping. This combination was known as the Steel Verband, and they put the matter as follows:

Large steel plants must work at a certain maximum capacity without interruption if they are to remain efficient and produce at a minimum cost. It is impossible for the home market of any plant in any country to absorb a large output without interruption in the flow of orders due to periods of depression from economic causes outside the influence of the steel industry. Also the increased complication of the coal, iron, and steel industries, the increased use of furnace gases for industrial purpose (gas engines), for running lighting plants for neighboring towns, also the concentration of all stages of production in a few large mills, have made it increasingly difficult to reduce production in any one line of all the allied processes without causing grave losses and disorganization in other lines. Also the combination of the steel works with the coal mines and coke burners, which in turn also must work at a certain maximum capacity in order to be profitable, makes the reduction of its steel output directly affect the entire coal-mining, ore-mining, and smelting industries. Of the entire coal output the members of the Steel Verband absorbed about half, the other half being controlled by the Coal Syndicate (treated separately). A reduction of steel production to a marked degree would therefore bring about a crisis in the coal industry The Steel Verband therefore maintains that it is better for the entire economic life of the country in slack years at home to dispose of surplus products abroad at prices which may even cause a loss, inasmuch as the loss incurred by dumping abroad is in no comparison to the losses which would be incurred if production were reduced at home. Also, if production were reduced at home the cost of production would rise in mills running at half time, which in turn would increase the prices of the products to such an extent that the home consumers would suffer a greater loss in the end than they would gain by a momentary price reduction.

I merely insert this German view as an item of pertinent information and as a warning possibly to be heeded in future years. This statement is taken from the 1916 report of the Federal Trade Commission on "Cooperation in American Export Trade," volume 2, page 14. The Tariff Commission in its comment on the replies of American business, in response to its request for information as to dumping on the United States, says:

The answers, as already noted, evidence a tendency to complain indiscriminately, not only of these methods condemned everywhere as unfair but also of every form of successful foreign competition. The latter attitude, if given legal sanction, would affect American business usages in the promotion of foreign trade and would invite retaliation by other countries. Ordinary price cutting and underselling are so universal, both in domestic and foreign fields, that it is taken for granted that restrictions are contemplated only when their practice is accompanied by unfair circumstances or by unfortunate public consequences.

The United States is at present producing and selling abroad merchandise valued at near $8,000,000,000, while it is importing in return merchandise amounting to less than $4,000,000,000, and in this latter amount manufactured goods ready for consumption are but nominal. Our imports of such manufactured goods are but little over $425,000,000 per annum, while our exports of manufactures ready for consumption are over $2,500,000,000. Our imports of crude materials for use in manufacturing are in round numbers $1,600,000,000, while we export other kinds of like materials to the amount of $2,000,000,000. Our imports of manufactures for further use in manufacturing are about $575,000,000, while our exports of manufactures for further use in manufacturing are over $900,000,000. It is evident from these figures and from general conditions of international trade, present and prospective, that there can and will be no really injurious or vicious dumping on the United States, save in limited instances, at any early date. I should make, among others, an exception as to certain phases of the dyestuff situation. I thoroughly agree that adequate action can not be taken any too soon to prevent that kind of dumping, wherein prices are cut for the purpose of destroying a competitor, either at its home or in a neutral market, or for the purpose of preventing the organization and development of a competing industry, or where the reasonable effects of dumping produce such results. No nation, nor any industry in it, should follow this unwarranted and vicious practice, nor will any commercial nation, in my judgment, permit foreign exporters in the future to inflict such injuries on its domestic manufacturers and producers. The purpose and terms of the proposed bill are certainly to this extent timely and wise. But the bill with its extremely drastic provisions does not stop here. It embraces, in addition, not only all the milder, less injurious, and certainly far less vicious forms of so-called dumping but also innumerable cases which do not constitute dumping in any accepted sense. The result will be that this proposed law will constitute either a bar or serious burden to tens of thousands of transactions which would not hurt but rather help our economic situation. The definitions of "foreign home value" and other commercial terms in the bill are highly technical, and will require detailed and closer examinations of goods and prices by our enforcement officials than ever before. Extreme difficulty will be encountered in determining the value of goods partly produced or manufactured in one country and partly in another. The definition of "dumping" is so broad and unqualified that the enforcement officials will be flooded with all kinds of complaints connected with transactions which do not come within the legitimate meaning of "dumping." I can best illustrate what I mean by referring to the result of the general inquiry as to the practice of dumping on our domestic producers and manufacturers made by the Tariff Commission within the past 18 months. Its letter of inquiry was sent to 39 business associations of manufacturers, importers, and exporters, including the United States Chamber of Commerce, Home Market Club, the National Foreign Trade Council, and other well-known commercial organizations.

The addresses of 562 manufacturers and other business firms were thus obtained and a letter written to each requesting information as to each or any known instance of "unfair competition through the selling in the United States of articles of foreign origin at less than the fair market value when sold for home consumption in the country of origin." Similar letters were also sent to a large number of other business concerns in the United States considered most likely to be affected by dumping. The Tariff Commission received 281 replies from manufacturers and others; 135 stated that the writers had no information of dumping in this country, while 146 offered complaint of certain forms of foreign competition which they had experienced. The Tariff Commission proceeded to analyze and list each of these complaints, with the result that, of the 146, 23 were listed under the definition of "dumping," 97 under that of severe competition, 5 under that of deceptive imitation and use of trade-mark, 8 under that of undervaluation, 4 under that of deceptive labeling, 7 under that of imitation of articles, 1 under that of threats, and 1 under that of exploitation of patents. It is thus seen that 146 business concerns or organizations, instead of being able to report 146 cases of dumping, only reported 23 actual cases, while the other 123 complaints, though constituting unfair competition and illegitimate trade methods, do not fall under the true definition of dumping in any form. Still the drastic features of the pending bill are such that most every transaction wherein the values appear suspicious in the slightest would be expected to receive the close scrutiny of our enforcement officials. The result would not only be a never-ending task but would operate as a serious burden on our manufacturers, traders, and consumers, for the reason, among others, that the immense amounts of raw materials and manufactures for further use in manufacturing, to which I have already referred, must continue to be purchased abroad on the best available terms—certainly at the world level of prices—and brought to this country, to be utilized in the business development of our manufacturing concerns and in the increased employment of labor.

Notwithstanding the Tariff Commission, after raking our domestic business world with a fine-tooth comb, calling upon scores of nation-wide commercial organizations and hundreds of individual manufacturing and other business concerns, was only able to locate 23 cases of dumping, including the mild as well as the aggravated cases—there were doubtless more—it is now proposed by the enactment of the pending air-tight bill to adopt as a permanent, cardinal trade policy of the United States the extreme prohibitions and exclusions which this bill would impose on every international trade transaction wherein the slightest variance downward between the import price and the price in the country of origin occurs.

It matters not that a given country is selling its raw materials to all other commercial nations lower than to its domestic consumers, our manufacturers purchasing them alone must pay the high prices it charges at home; it matters not that Germany or other sugar-producing countries are selling abroad cheaper than at home, as was the case prior to the Brussels convention, our American consumers alone must pay the higher home market price plus our sugar tariff; it matters not that a given country is selling any one of innumerable classes of products or materials to all the world at prices lower than the domestic price to the advantage rather than the injury of every country purchasing them, the people and business concerns of the United States alone must pay the higher home-market prices in every instance. The proposed bill contains not a single saving clause nor makes a single exception no matter what the nature of the foreign trade transaction, but treats the mildest and most harmless transaction that partakes but slightly of the nature of dumping as criminally as it does the most aggravated, cutthroat case of dumping, notwithstanding the former may be of real benefit to the American purchaser and the American people and the latter a serious injury. Even the only three antidumping laws in existence save our own are far more moderate than our present proposal; even the proposed law in England contains certain qualifying and elastic provisions; and in fact no antidumping policy ever proposed in any country has been so utterly drastic and inelastic as that suggested by the pending bill. The antidumping bill recently offered in the English House of Commons contains the following basic provision, prescribing the prerequisites to the imposition of the special dumping duty:

(a) That goods of any class or description produced or manufactured in any country outside the United Kingdom are systematically and in substantial quantities being imported into or being sold or offered for sale in the United Kingdom at prices below the foreign value as defined by this act or that there are good grounds for apprehending that such importation or sale is about to take place; and

(b) That the production or manufacture of similar goods in the United Kingdom is or is likely to be thereby adversely affected.

It will be seen that the very wording of these provisions exempts a long list of import-trade transactions not hurtful but helpful to British industry, which our bill would include and practically prevent. Other saving clauses designed to draw a line between all import transactions calculated to benefit the British people and British industry and those other classes of transactions which comprise actual dumping in the injurious and destructive sense are found in the British measure, such as the following:

Provided, That if the vendor previously to the sale has satisfied the board that the sale at the price at which the goods are to be sold is due to depreciation in the quality of the goods or to any other cause which it appears to the board should be taken into account.

In all the history of international commerce, in the light of all past experience in foreign trade, only three other countries to-day, so far as I can learn, have permanent substantive antidumping laws, and neither of these three countries is a separate, independent nation. They are Canada, Australia, and the Union of South Africa. Only England, among the important commercial nations, by their trade policies—high tariff, low tariff, or no tariff—has thus far proposed new or additional antidumping legislation.

And in this connection I desire specially to call attention to the reported fact that immediately after the British measure was offered in the House of Commons some months ago people and business concerns of every shade of opinion—protectionist as well as free trade—proceeded violently to assault it, with the result that some weeks ago it was officially announced by its sponsors that the bill had been abandoned for this session, and the general opinion is that it is permanently dead. This British proposal seems to be based on a revival of one of the famous Paris resolutions at the economic conference of the Allies in 1916, which in part at least, I must believe, were intended for war consumption. It was on this occasion that, economically speaking, the Allies declared "war after the war," which outstanding declaration is now being rapidly forgotten. I may say that I heartily favor reasonable, practical, antidumping legislation.

Even the Canadian law, drastic as it is, contains many qualifying and liberalizing provisions, designed to reach and deal only with the limited classes of cases of really injurious and destructive dumping without interfering with the ordinary processes and natural currents of international commerce, the results of which are, in the aggregate, far more helpful than hurtful to the people, including the manufacturers of Canada. Canada's law imposes dumping duty "in the case of articles exported to Canada of a class or kind made or produced in Canada, if the export or actual selling price to the importer in Canada is less than the fair market value of the same article when sold for home consumption in the usual and ordinary course in the country whence exported to Canada at the time of its exportation to Canada." This is the general basic provision of the Canadian law, but radical reservations and qualifications too numerous to set out here will also be found as a part of the same statute. For example, the special dumping duty shall not exceed 15 per cent ad valorem in any case, whereas under the pending measure it may exceed 50 per cent, or 100 per cent, or 200 per cent, since no limitation is prescribed. This is the only proposal for an unlimited tax that I know of. Another provision in the Canadian law exempts entirely from any dumping duty "goods wherein the duties otherwise established are equal to 50 per cent ad valorem," whereas under the terms of the pending measure our regular tariff rates may be 60 per cent or more and our maximum domestic production may be but little above nominal, and still the special dumping duty which may run from 50 per cent to 100 per cent and upward without limit would be superimposed. The Canadian law exempts sugar refined in the United Kingdom, binder twine, and so forth. Still another liberalizing provision of the Canadian law is as follows:

> Such regulations may also provide for the exemption from special duty of any article when the difference between the fair market value and the selling price thereof to the exporter as aforesaid amounts only to a small percentage of its fair market value.

Under this regulation the margin is fixed at 5 per cent. Our proposed law prescribes no special margin, but would impose the special additional duty, however slight the margin might be.

It will be observed that the Canadian antidumping law limits the special duty to articles "of a class or kind made or produced in Canada," while our proposed measure takes a radical step in advance by including in addition "articles of the kind sold in competition with articles made or produced in the United States." This clause is new to all existing antidumping legislation, and its administration will involve constant controversy and unlimited difficulties. In a large sense, an automobile is sold in competition with the two-horse carriage; an autotruck is sold in competition with the dray wagon. These examples but illustrate the innumerable conditions of competition to which strenuous efforts will be made to apply the proposed provision of our antidumping bill. The articles may properly have different names and may be in all essential respects of a different make-up, but if "of a kind sold in competition," this bill would apply; otherwise, what does this language mean, and where does the application of its meaning begin and where does it end? This language could be applied so as to result in the outright prohibition of many imports of a most desirable and necessary character. This clause might properly be called a provision for the maintenance of high prices in this country. Our regular tariff schedules, whether high or low, are supposed to deal adequately with a vast number of transactions on which it is attempted to superimpose an additional duty of an irregular and uncertain amount by this and other clauses in the bill.

The enforcement of our proposed comprehensive antidumping law will severely tax any administrative agency vested with that authority and duty. With a foreign trade aggregating near $12,000,000,000, the American tradesmen will either buy or sell in nearly every port and important inland market in the world. Speaking of the ease with which Canada can administer her law and of the far greater difficulty our country will experience, the United States Tariff Commission in its report says:

> If the United States enacts a similar statute, it may find a different and more complex task presented by the world-wide foreign prices of import articles, especially those of continental Europe and the Orient. It also remains to be seen whether effective methods of evasions of such statutes will not hereafter be devised.

The bare mention of this administrative question shows that the conditions compared with those of Canada are entirely different. In considering the enormity of the administrative problem which this bill presents, we should keep in mind the one broad and inflexible general provision which, without exception, qualification, or reservation, directs that the special dumping duty shall in every instance be imposed on each article of merchandise, whether dutiable or free, which may be imported into the United States of a class or kind already described, equal to the difference between the import or sales price here and the sales price in the country of origin, as defined, provided, of course, the import price is the lesser of the two.

This herculean task will require a knowledge on the part of our administrative officials of the innumerable kinds, qualities, conditions, ingredients, origin, and values in the foreign countries of manufacture of the 3,000 or more different kinds, classes, and characters of commodities which we are accustomed to import. It is proposed to dump this burden upon the customs officials of the Treasury Department to be borne as a coordinate part of their present regular duties. In my judgment, it is a matter of grave doubt as to whether they should be made chiefly responsible for the satisfactory administration of the proposed measure, for the reason that unless their force should be greatly augmented and extended to various parts of the world and a special organization built up at home from the bottom to the top, the principal time of which should be devoted to this rather than the regular customs service, the administration would be in danger of breaking down. In the light of these conditions the intimation of the Tariff Commission that the Federal Trade Commission or some similar official body might much more feasibly be delegated and authorized to deal with the administrative work which the antidumping bill will require strikes me as very forcible.

This would be after the order of the Australian method of preventing antidumping practices, whereby dumping is treated very properly as a method of unfair competition. Tribunals are given jurisdiction to entertain and pass judicially upon these questions. By the act of September 26, 1914, creating the Federal Trade Commission, section 5 declares unfair methods of competition in commerce as unlawful, and directs the Federal Trade Commission to prevent any business concern from using unfair methods of competition in commerce. Adequate penalties are prescribed through court agencies. The procedure is well defined. The Federal Trade Commission has rendered extensive, effective, and valuable service in exposing and stamping out unfair methods of domestic competition. It would be easy enough to insert a provision making comprehensive the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission over acts of dumping, and it would not be bad policy to include certain other unfair methods of competition in international commerce, and in addition such trade commission could be given power to investigate the conditions of production, importation, and sale of all merchandise imported from any foreign country to the United States, with a view to ascertaining whether such unfair methods of competition exist; and if so, the commission could enforce the prohibitory provisions of the law under the powers granted by section 5 of the said act approved September 26, 1914, which should be conferred upon it by the pending measure.

By the authority of these provisions, if inserted in the proposed measure, a well-defined and already effectively organized tribunal consisting of officials and employees skilled and experienced in just this class of investigation and this character of functions would be prepared immediately to proceed with the administration and enforcement of all unfair trade practices arising under the proposed antidumping legislation. Under the authority of the act creating it, the Federal Trade Commission made an extensive investigation of competitive conditions affecting Americans in international trade, and published the results in two large volumes in the year 1916. The power which the commission exercised in making this investigation and report was based on paragraph (h) of the act creating it, as follows:

> To investigate, from time to time, trade conditions in and with foreign countries where associations, combinations, or practices of manufacturers, merchants, or traders or other conditions may affect the foreign trade of the United States, and to report to Congress thereon with such recommendations as it deems advisable.

It is thus seen that the work and functions of the Federal Trade Commission would easily dovetail into the coordinate and similar functions of enforcing the proposed antidumping, and such kindred, legislation as may be contained in the pending bill when finally enacted into law. The methods used by this commission in gathering information for its report on competitive conditions affecting American international trade were:

> (1) Special reports for the commission from the United States consuls; (2) public hearings by the commission; (3) research in published material; (4) inquiry cards and formal schedules sent to American business and professional men; (5) investigations, in this country and abroad, by the commission's field agents.

To these agencies of information would be added the officials and employees of the United States Customs Service who would closely cooperate with the commission.

Any law which so vitally affects the large percentage of foreign trade transactions such as this bill proposes, a law that confers great power more or less arbitrary, should have as its administrative agency a tribunal consisting of a systematic, well-defined, accurately functioning organization, which could entertain and consider according to legal forms, procedure, and practice the manifold matters of controversy that will arise under this antidumping legislation, and render true judgment according to the law and the facts. It may be suggested that this is a revenue measure and therefore should fall under the administration of the customs officials. The experience with existing antidumping laws disproves this view. The amount of revenue derived from the operation of the Canadian law during the past six years has only averaged seven one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the total customs duties collected in Canada during the past six years, or, in other words, it is less than nominal when compared with the total.

The vast intricacies of many transactions involving dumping make it most difficult satisfactorily and clearly to establish the fact of dumping. The Tariff Commission in its report says:

> In the absence of governmental machinery devoted to its detection, conclusive proof of dumping is difficult to obtain. * * * In the absence of large investigating powers the task of an individual who seeks to convert suspicious circumstances into proof, one element of which must be found abroad, is usually of extreme difficulty.

Canada has had her troubles in this regard, although her trade area is so limited that her problem in this respect is simple compared to that which the United States must undertake. The Canadian law has been applied in the main to imports from the United States, while, as heretofore indicated, the enforcement of a United States statute would involve world-wide investigation and access to the exporters' books in almost all commercial countries. These conditions strengthen the force of the suggestion that a special and distinctive tribunal, organized in chief part for the purpose and which can function actively and efficiently in all essential respects, will be highly necessary.

"Dumping" in its more injurious and aggravated forms is but one of the large number of hurtful, irritating, and unfair practices common to international commerce, each of which is unjustifiable from the standpoint of fair dealing, friendly business rivalry, and friendly trade relations. Unfriendly trade relations means unfriendly political and diplomatic relations. It would be difficult to enumerate all the forms of unfair competition, extending from the slightest method of discrimination up to the worst degree of boycotting in return, but there are included in the list of unfair trade practices in foreign commerce all forms of tariff discrimination and retaliation; preferential right of entry to ports; discriminating embargo laws and restrictions; unfair utilization of bounties, bonuses, subsidies, drawbacks and rebates; wrongful seizure and utilization of patents, copyrights, trade-marks, and trade brands; the economic and financial violation of the territory of small, uncivilized, or backward nations; tonnage and shipping discriminations; wrongful interference with trade routes; violations of the "open door"; hurtful and unfair economic alliances; undue colonial preference; discriminating trade concessions; and other preferences by special agreements. What are ordinarily known as our commercial treaties with other nations have in the past dealt but slightly with any of the more or less vicious and unfair methods just enumerated, but in the main they only embrace the following subjects: (a) Most-favored-nation clause; (b) liberty to trade and travel; (c) passports; (d) nationality of vessels; (e) tonnage dues; (f) no shipping discriminations; (g) port regulations; (h) coastwise trade; (i) deserters from ships; (j) shipwrecks; (k) blockade, embargo, contraband, and other war measures; (l) patents, trade-marks, copyrights, and designs; (m) consular officers.

I think it most deplorable that the recent peace congress at Paris was unable, or at least failed, to agree to and announce a policy which would require steps to be taken to eliminate by international agreement as many of these irritating and unfair trade practices as it might be possible and at all consistent for the various commercial nations to agree to. For more than three years I have had a resolution pending in the House proposing an international trade agreement congress, for the purpose of discontinuing by agreement at least the worst forms of discrimination, retaliation, and other unfair trade practices to the fullest extent possible. The present is peculiarly the time—while the network of commercial treaties existing prior to the war are broken or abandoned, and while the various commercial nations are readjusting their domestic and foreign commercial policies—effectively and definitely to abandon the irritating classes of trade practices I have mentioned. No more important step forward could have been, or could be, taken, in my judgment. The alternative is that each nation shall lapse back into the old ruts, proceed to "act the hog," and seek every possible commercial advantage by fair means or foul, the result of which will be to revive every phase of those vicious, unfair, and war-breeding trade practices and policies which in most instances have constituted at least one of the chief underlying causes of past wars. Individually speaking, I can not too strongly urge the view that the various commercial nations of the world should by concert of action seek to discontinue rather than resume all these unjustifiable, cutthroat, selfish, and undermining trade methods which in the aggregate inflict far more harm than good upon each and all. The pursuit of this latter course would clearly be narrow, shortsighted, and, in the end, frightfully calamitous, as it has been in the past. It is my belief, therefore, that before each nation proceeds to adopt methods of serious discrimination or of too severe retaliation it will be wise first to ascertain whether more desirable international trade policies could first be agreed to by common understanding. Certainly there is no present necessity for the United States to be at all hasty in proclaiming, and in returning to, the old order of commercial practices which have been so disastrous to international good will and international peace. Whenever this Nation adopts a drastic, inflexible, antidumping policy instead of a reasonable and conservative one, or any other policy of vigorous retaliation, or any methods of discrimination, it thereby invites, or at least gives its assent to, every other nation to adopt similar and, if they desire, even more drastic policies in kind. I thoroughly agree that it is wise and timely that we should devise measures to prevent any kind of dumping intended to destroy a competitor, either at its home or in a neutral market, or to prevent the organization and development of a competing industry, or any phase or policy of dumping so substantial, fixed, permanent, and systematic that the reasonable effects of which would produce such results. Again, I may point to the dyestuffs situation as an example, but in so doing I desire to express the view that if the German dyestuffs organizations should again become at all powerful no one method will protect our domestic industries from unjust injury from these German influences.

A tariff based as nearly as may be on the relative cost of production, an antidumping provision, and also a temporary license system, operating jointly, will be necessary. Apart, however, from the dyestuffs and a few other conditions calling for immediate action by this Government, there are no others, either present or prospective, which require or from the wise, economic standpoint suggest further antidumping precautions at this time. We are the greatest producing, the greatest creditor, and the greatest exporting Nation in the world at present; we expect in the future to maintain our relative portion of international trade, and in so doing to ship and sell our great variety of surplus products to all the nations of the earth. The balance of the world is hopelessly behind in most lines of production and is strenuously calling on us for every kind of available surplus we have to spare. Prices of commodities generally are extremely high and in many instances going higher. Prices are high in the United States, and the enactment of a comprehensive, inflexible antidumping law such as is now proposed will have a tendency to sustain and increase rather than decrease existing high prices. This is no time to stimulate or increase prices to the American consumers and to the American manufacturers as to raw materials and semimanufactured products when they are already artificially high, when ours is the only country that has surpluses in important lines, and when the world not only has nothing to dump upon us but nothing to sell to us except, in the main, raw materials, products for further use in manufacturing, and noncompetitive articles such as coffee, tea, and rubber. In this period of high prices at home we can, to a real advantage rather than to any detriment, buy virtually anything the world has to sell and at such prices as may be offered. We want to lower rather than raise prices at present. The effect of the Canadian antidumping law, even with its radically qualified provisions, has been needlessly to increase prices to her citizens and business concerns in many classes of cases, not to say generally. And yet it is now proposed to impose a similar burden on the American people, notwithstanding there is no prospect of really injurious dumping in the early future save in the few special instances to which I have referred. It would be absurd to assume that other nations in the present demoralized state of their industries and their lack of adequate production will sell what limited amounts of products they might have available to the United States at less than the best prices obtainable. The recent action of some of their chambers of commerce to this effect is strong evidence in support of this view. We can be sure, too, that they will price their goods to us in dollars and not in their own depreciated currency.

It is clear from the facts and conditions already recited that the proposed antidumping bill should not become a law without first being radically modified—until a number of important and material qualifications and exceptions are made a part of it—so as to exclude from its operation any and all import transactions save those classes which I have heretofore expressly pointed out and defined. It would be entirely feasible to so frame the bill that its prohibitory provisions would only affect such imports as would be actually hurtful in the sense already explained without at the same time uselessly adding to the cost of that other large mass of import transactions which in the main are beneficial to both the American manufacturer and consumer. It would not be difficult to enumerate a long list of this latter class of imports, but I have already proceeded at too great length.

Let me in closing quote from the famous speech of President McKinley at Buffalo, delivered on September 5, 1901, as follows:

Our capacity to produce has developed so enormously and our products have so multiplied that the problem of more markets requires our urgent and immediate attention. * * * We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. * * * The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals.

Every sentence in this memorable statement applies with powerful force to our domestic and foreign trade situation to-day. Gentlemen may talk about looking alone to the development of our domestic trade to the exclusion of export business, but with our enormous supply of raw materials, the tremendous development of our manufacturing capacity before and especially during the war, and with our $12,000,000,000 of foreign commerce, I can point to no greater economic truth than to say that the biggest factor in our domestic prosperity during the coming years will be our foreign trade. This is true because there is no more patent fact than that the United States is producing far more than it can hope to consume at home, and the only possible way by which industry can operate at full capacity and labor secure constant employment is to maintain a stable foreign trade of such volume as will dispose of the vast surplus in many lines we will from year to year have on hand. To maintain this amount of foreign trade it is vitally important that we should produce at home on the lowest cost basis possible. The effectiveness of American industry and American labor makes this possible in a thoroughly satisfactory degree. But we can not hope to accomplish this much-desired end and go forward with the expansion of our great domestic and foreign trade if we proceed to erect many of the artificial barriers which I have heretofore specially enumerated, the inevitable result of which will be unnecessarily to increase generally our production costs. Extreme and unnecessary high tariff provisions are included in this list of artificial barriers and would prove even more fatal than many or most others. The higher level of costs of production thereby created in this country would prevent our selling our surplus abroad, with the result that production would have to be curtailed to meet only the domestic requirements, which would mean the shutting down of factories, the slowing up of enterprise generally, and the laying off of labor from employment during a good portion of each year. Utter stagnation would be our lot. Under this shortsighted, unwise, benighted, and suicidal policy the United States would be obliged itself to invoke the dumping practice, as it has too often done in the past.

River and Harbor Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 20, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, my colleague from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] I do not think has quite fully answered the question I propounded as to the reasons which moved the committee to make a lump-sum appropriation of $7,000,000 for carrying on pending authorized projects. I asked him (p. 1799, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 20, 1920): "What objection would there be, then, to saying in the bill how and where it is proposed to expend the $7,000,000?" In replying he gave the same reasons as were urged in the committee report in extenuation of the lump sum of $5,000,000 for maintenance. That report confesses that the policy of making a lump-sum appropriation for maintenance was an "experiment" and says that it was only adopted to enable the Engineers to shift appropriations in order to meet unexpected damages due to storms and floods. Having such contingencies in mind no one would dare assert that a lump-sum policy for maintenance is unreasonable. But no such excuse was made by the committee in support of that policy in the handling of the appropriations for pending projects, and I do not think that such excuse is valid.

If storm or flood or other disturbance of the customary conditions should damage or interfere with pending projects, I have no doubt that the maintenance fund of $5,000,000 could properly be drawn upon. The $7,000,000 appropriation is and should be exclusively for carrying on pending improvements.

The question that concerns this House most vitally is the wisdom of departing from the long-established and wise custom of making specific instead of lump-sum appropriations. Neither my colleague nor the Rivers and Harbors Committee has given any convincing reason why that departure has been made. We are therefore thrown back upon our own resources to find or try to find the motive. I ask your indulgence, therefore, in an analysis of the situation.

There are now on hand unexpended balances of upward of $27,000,000 at the disposal of the United States Engineers for pending projects. I have enumerated in the following table 39 projects under way in which there are on hand amounts more than ample to continue such work on the basis of average annual outlay for the preceding five years:

Total expended fiscal year 1919	$21,245,177
Average expended last five years	26,229,851
On hand Nov. 1, 1919, in project funds, including all projects for which additional funds are asked	27,000,000

Is it likely, therefore, that the committee have in mind that the Engineers will apply any part of their lump-sum appropriation to any of these projects? Why should they when they have no need to or are not directed?

In the following table I think we can arrive at a nearer approximation to the purpose the committee seem so determined to conceal. In this table are shown 33 improvements which have less on hand than is necessary to equal their average annual expenditure. It would seem quite possible, therefore, that it is the object of the committee to provide for the continuance of these projects and to put enough to their credit in the hands of the Secretary of War to enable the United States Engineers to continue the respective improvements.

But the fact is that that is only an inference. What guaranty is there that the Secretary of War will continue these undertakings? It is left wholly in his discretion. Here are the projects in question. The table shows: First, last year's expenditures; second, the amount on hand; and, third, the average annual expenditure for the last five years.

The question is, Are these the projects which are going to get the $7,000,000? If that is so, what is the objection to saying so? If not, why should not that fact also be revealed? What excuse is there for keeping the Members of this House and the country in the dark? We are entitled to the information, and the country is entitled to the information. If this is to be a "porkless river and harbor bill" in name, let it be so in fact. There can be no "pork" in any bill where the name, nature, and amount of every appropriation is frankly disclosed. It is only in these dark and sinister, hooded and cloaked bills that the danger of corruption lurks. Let us have more light.

OF

HON. JOHN I. NOLAN,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 22, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, in support of the amendment that I offered in the House during the consideration of the pending rivers and harbors bill, providing for a preliminary survey of Islais Creek, San Francisco, Calif., I desire to incorporate a communication from the president of the State board of harbor commissioners—Hon. John H. McCallum, San Francisco, Calif.—as well as a brief prepared by Mr. Frank G. White, chief engineer for the State board of harbor commissioners, San Francisco, Calif. Also an excerpt from the report of the State board of harbor commissioners for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918:

BOARD OF STATE HARBOR COMMISSIONERS,
San Francisco, Calif., June 19, 1919.

Hon. JOHN I. NOLAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: You will recall that during your recent stay at San Francisco you accompanied a committee of Congressmen on a survey which they made on the Bay of San Francisco looking toward the establishment of a naval base.

In journeying to and from Hunters Point you will recall our chief engineer, Mr. White, as well as myself, calling your attention to our proposed development at Islais Creek, and the necessity of receiving some aid from the Federal Government in the way of dredging an approach to Islais Creek.

This board, as well as the chamber of commerce and the shipping interests, are of the opinion that the Federal Government should render some assistance on this matter; and therefore the request that you present to the proper committee a bill asking for a preliminary investigation or survey of our requirements.

I am mailing you, under separate cover, a map showing the creek itself, together with the district which we think ought to be dredged and which appears on the map in red.

Any assistance that you can render us in getting this started in the right channels will not only be appreciated by this board but by the shipping interests of San Francisco Bay.

With kind personal regards, I am,

Yours, very truly,

J. H. MCCALLUM,
President.

P. S.—In order that you may understand the project and development which we have under way I am sending you under separate cover a copy of our biennial report and would ask that you give particular attention to pages 20, 23, and 24, which treat of the work to be done in that vicinity.

I am calling your particular attention to the vegetable-oil station mentioned on page 24, work on which is in course of progress at the present time, and in order to handle the large commerce coming to this port carrying oriental oils we hope to get the assistance of the Government in getting the necessary dredging done.

VEGETABLE OIL STATION.

There is urgent need at the present time for a well-equipped station for handling the various kinds of oriental vegetable oils and it is proposed to use for this purpose a portion of the filled land and the existing wharf on the south side of Islais Creek and east of Third Street. On this property the board contemplates the construction in the near future of facilities for the handling of barrel, case, and bulk oil. These will consist of a pumping plant, pipe lines, tanks, case and barrel storage, dumping tables, can balers, etc. A number of the oil importers have expressed their willingness to build the tanks necessary for their own use and it is the board's intention to build only a few small tanks to be used for overflow and emergency business. In conjunction with the oil station there will be provided a tank barge with a capacity of about 700 tons of bulk oil, which will be used as the connecting link between the steamships and the storage tanks and which will be available in case any cargoes are not large enough to justify the steamships in moving to the oil berth.

INDIA BASIN-ISLAIS CREEK DEVELOPMENT.

The construction of the wharf which extends along the south side of the Islais Creek channel from Third Street to Selby Street marked the initial step in the development of the India Basin-Islais Creek district. Comprehensive plans for the improvement of this district are under way and the work will be carried out in successive steps as the requirements of shipping demand.

BOARD OF STATE HARBOR COMMISSIONERS,
San Francisco, Calif., August 14, 1919.

Miss HILDA GOHRMAN,
Secretary Board of State Harbor Commissioners.

MY DEAR MISS GOHRMAN: In preparing "brief" for Congressman NOLAN to be used in connection with the proposition to dredge in the vicinity of Islais Creek, the following facts should be brought out:

1. "San Francisco Harbor is the largest and most important harbor on the Pacific coast of the United States." I quote from page 1671 of the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers to the Secretary of War, dated September 10, 1918.

2. The entire water front is owned by the State of California and is under the jurisdiction of the Board of State Harbor Commissioners.

3. This board has constructed 38 piers in addition to ferry slips, wharves, sea walls, buildings, a belt railroad, etc., aggregating in value at the present time more than $20,000,000. The water front has been practically built new within the last 10 years.

4. The berthing space available alongside the existing structures is more than 14 miles in length, and the piers and wharves have an area of more than 134 acres.

5. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, 10,258,000 tons of cargo were handled over these structures.

6. Up to July 1, 1918, there has been expended by the United States through the Chief of Engineers of the War Department on projects around San Francisco Bay a total of $6,796,626.94, distributed as follows:

(1) Harbor of San Francisco	$709,651.52
(2) Redwood Creek	46,119.10
(3) Oakland Harbor	4,515,599.87
(4) Richmond Harbor	None.
(5) San Pablo Bay	1,283,493.75
(6) Suisun Channel	18,592.63
(7) Napa River	60,369.79
(8) Petaluma Creek	162,800.28
	6,769,626.94

In addition, $100,000 has been appropriated for the Richmond Harbor project.

7. Although the sum of $709,651.52 is charged against the harbor of San Francisco only a fractional part of this should be so charged. Practically all of the money was expended in the removal of Centissima Rock, Rincon Reef Rocks, Arch Rock, Blossom Rock, and Shag Rocks. These rocks were located in or near the Golden Gate or in the main channels in the bay, and were a menace to navigation into or in the bay, regardless of the destination of the vessel. I quote again from the report of the Chief of Engineers, page 1672, in which he refers to these projects:

"Effect of improvement: The chief menaces to shipping entering and leaving the port have been removed."

This shows that he recognizes the fact that these improvements are of benefit to the entire port and not alone to the harbor at San Francisco.

As a matter of fact practically no expenditures have been made solely for the benefit of the San Francisco Harbor, while more than $6,000,000 have been spent for other harbors on the bay.

8. The dredging which is requested is required to render accessible improvements already constructed by the board along the south side of Islais Creek Channel. These improvements consist of wharves about one-half mile in length which are used for handling rice, lumber, etc. Back of one wharf the board is now constructing an oil terminal to be used for handling oriental vegetable oils. When this terminal is completed it will be necessary for vessels plying to the Orient to dock at this wharf.

9. The board is planning a large development of this section which will be inaccessible until this dredging is done. It is expected that the first unit of this development will be begun in the near future.

10. The board owns and operates a dredging plant which is constantly in operation and which maintains the necessary depth of water in the slips adjacent to all piers and wharves. The cost of operation of this plant is merely $100,000 per year.

Very truly, yours,

FRANK G. WHITE, Chief Engineer.

For a number of years I have consistently voted against rivers and harbors appropriation bills due to the fact that they contained immense appropriations for projects of doubtful value to the commerce of the country. I shall be very glad to support the pending bill and wish to thank the House and committee for incorporating my amendment for a preliminary survey of Islais Creek. It will be noted that there has been but a very small amount of money spent by the United States Government on the San Francisco Bay side of the world's greatest harbor, but Islais Creek section is destined to become one of the most important units in San Francisco's great harbor system, and the comparatively small amount of money necessary to thoroughly dredge Islais Creek channel will be spent upon a very meritorious project.

Railroad Control.

SPEECH

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Saturday, December 20, 1919.

The Senate had under consideration the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I shall not attempt, in the closing hours of this debate, to reply in detail to the arguments advanced in support of this bill.

The one point chiefly relied on, to pass the pending measure returning the railroads to the private owners, is that the American public will be saved two or three hundred million dollars a year on the cost of operation.

The junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in his able speech two or three days ago, stated the argument, and the whole of it, when he said:

> If they—
> The railroads—
> are going to be controlled by private owners, if the future policy is going to be to turn them back to private owners—and that is what I am in favor of doing—then I do not see why we should continue the burden on the American public of $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 a year for another year. I think we had better turn them back right now. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Dec. 16, p. 678.)

That argument has the merit of being easily understood. It is the statement which has been scattered broadcast over the country during the last few months so as to prepare the public mind for the return of the railroads to the private owners. Of course, that argument does not justify the return of the roads to private hands under this particular bill, because this particular bill goes a great deal further than merely returning the roads to private ownership. It does not justify the extraordinary features of this bill, which are not necessary in order to effect a return of the roads, but it is the one argument that has been made in support of the demand for the immediate relinquishment of Government control of the railroads.

If it is true that as a result of the return of these roads to private operation the American public is going to be saved two hundred million or three hundred million dollars a year, I admit that to be a very strong argument in favor of so returning these roads to the owners. But, on the other hand, if facts show that the return of the roads will save the American public nothing, then the argument for the return of the roads fails utterly. If we go one step further and show that the return of the roads to private operation means an additional charge and burden on the American public of many times $300,000,000 a year, then, by the logic of the supporters of the bill, the argument against the return becomes well-nigh conclusive.

So that the question gets right down to the question of fact, and fortunately the facts are established or admitted which show that the return of these roads to private hands is going to cost the people of this country annually several times $300,000,000. That the return of the roads and their continued operation in private hands will ultimately cost the people of this country many billions of dollars a year can be shown with great certainty.

But as to the immediate annual cost of returning the roads there is no question at all. The facts are before us. In the first place, it is to be said that the argument of the supporters of this bill that retention of the roads by the Government will cost the people of this country two hundred or three hundred million dollars a year, or any other sum whatever, is purely speculative. It is based upon nothing excepting the fact that the operating income of the roads during the period of the war was insufficient by about $250,000,000 a year to pay the extortionate rentals to the roads which the Government undertook to pay when they were taken over and the extraordinary cost of operating the roads under war conditions.

That is no more of an argument than it would be to say that because a man lived and supported his family on $1,000 or $2,000 prior to the war he should be able to support his family just as well on the same income during and since the war. With the cost of railway labor increased I believe it has been stated in the argument here something like a billion dollars a year during and since the war period; with the cost of fuel and other materials almost doubled as a result of the war; with the roads run for the purpose of winning the war instead of making money, it must be obvious to any fair-minded man that because a loss resulted under those conditions is no argument at all to support the claims of any loss in Government operation under normal conditions.

So I say that the argument that the roads must be run by the Government at a loss during normal conditions because they were run at a loss under war conditions is purely speculative, and the analogy by which the argument is attempted to be supported is wholly fallacious.

When you turn, however, to the other side of the ledger and inquire what it is going to cost the people of this country immediately when the roads are turned back, the increased burden to be at once imposed upon the people is clearly stated and so well authenticated that no man can mistake the facts.

In the first place, this bill, when it came before the Senate, carried on its face a provision for a loan to the roads, which was to accompany their return, of a sum representing the advances made by the Government, amounting to $800,000,000 to $1,000,000,000.

Then the bill carries on its face a very handsome guaranty for four months after the roads are returned of the standard return, based upon the previous earnings of the roads. That will mean a few million more to be taken out of the public. Not satisfied with that, since the bill has been before the Senate it has been amended so as to provide for an immediate loan to the roads of $500,000,000. All this money has to come out of the pockets of the American public. It has to be raised in taxes.

Thus, according to the argument of the proponents of this bill, it is proposed in this single item alone to take out of the pockets of the American people at once enough money to cover the loss of Government operation for another two years, even if the approximate loss during the war were continued.

Which is going to be the more burdensome, then, to the American public, the more immediately burdensome—returning the roads to private operation or continuing Government operation?

It is idle to say that this is a loan and that it is going to be paid back some time. It is like the many other billions of dollars of the people's money that the Government has loaned in recent years. We do not know it will ever be paid back. But the point is that at this time, now, this money has to come out of the pockets of the people when they can least afford it.

We are talking about continuing the burden on the American public, in the language of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], but the greatest burden of all which the return of these roads is going to place upon the American public remains to be mentioned, and that is the burden of increased fares, rates, and charges by the railroads. I want to remind the Senate, Mr. President, that every increase in freight rates, while paid in the first instance by the shipper, is ultimately paid by the consumer, but not in the amount which the shipper paid. It has been computed by those entirely competent to make the computation—among others, Director General Hines—that an increase in freight rates of $1, by the time it is passed on from the manufacturer, who first pays the increase as he ships his goods—his products—to the wholesaler, to the jobber, and from the jobber on through the various stages until it finally reaches the consumer, carries with it a multiplication of the freight rate originally paid by the producer and shipper of the product amounting to five times the amount of the original freight rate by the time it reaches the consumer. It is just as much of a tax upon consumers as though it were a tax levied directly on their homes or on their incomes.

We know that this increase is going to come if the roads go back to private hands, for every railroad official who has testified or spoken upon the subject, or who has been interviewed by the press, has said that the rates must be increased, and every Senator on the floor who has championed the bill admits that to be the fact. We know also from the testimony of the railway officials themselves that the increase in rates will amount at least to more than $700,000,000.

A few days ago, speaking upon the bill in the Senate, I quoted from an interview with Mr. Kruttschnitt, president of the Southern Pacific Railroad, given to the New York Times a week ago last Sunday. In that interview Mr. Kruttschnitt stated emphatically and positively that as soon as the roads were turned back to their owners they should press at once for an immediate increase of $742,000,000 in railroad rates. He supported that statement with the argument familiar to all members of the committee.

There is no more doubt than that we are here in the Senate Chamber at this moment that this increase of rates will be forced upon the country. That is the minimum of their demands—$742,000,000. That was backed up by the statement which I submitted to the Senate at that time, made by the President of the Northern Pacific on the 21st day of November at a banquet held at New York, in which he declared that the railroads must have immediately this increase of rates. He did not name the amount, but he stated that it must be very considerable, a very large increase.

I have been told by the financial department of the Railroad Administration of the Government now operating the roads that there is every reason to believe that if the roads are left with the Government for operation no increase in freight rates will be imposed upon the country. I sought information from the financial department of the Railroad Administration, because that is the department that is best informed as to the financial needs of the roads. They inform me that all the indications point to the largest tonnage in railway transportation for the coming year in the history of our Government. That is the indication. Members of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Railroad Administration look out upon the next year as being the biggest in tonnage, in profit, and that means in railroad profit, that the country has ever seen in all its history in normal years.

It ought to be said in this connection—and I say it notwithstanding it may be in some way a repetition of what I have said heretofore on the floor—that it was necessary to maintain a great overhead by the Government in railway operation in order to handle the war business during the war period. When the armistice came, transportation fell off abruptly, almost instantly, in enormous proportions because of the cancellation of war orders.

We were informed about that at the time. We had to pass in the Senate an emergency measure providing for the war contracts that were canceled over the telephone and by telegraph. The Government had an immense machine here for handling transportation during the war, the mightiest transportation organization that the world has ever seen, built up to meet the needs not of this country, sir, but of the world, in so far at least as those who were in partnership with us in the prosecution of the war were concerned.

At the stroke of the clock, quite unexpectedly, the armistice was signed. Then it became the duty of those who were contracting for world production to stop expense and, stopping the expense, to stop production, and stopping production cut down the freight shipments and at once reduced receipts for the railroads that were being operated by the Government. But there had been built up a great machine for handling that world transportation and you could not instantly adjust that; you could not at once keep pace in reducing the overhead charges with the immediate reduction of freight tonnage from a war-time basis to a peace-time basis. It would have meant throwing hundreds of thousands of men out of employment. It would have involved a social problem, an economic problem. It could not be done. It takes time for a mighty organization to adjust itself to radical and revolutionary changes such as the armistice brought about. So this overhead charge for a great war-time machine continued to operate until it could be slowed down here, reduced there, and adjusted in the course of time to the new conditions which the armistice had brought to the country.

In counting the expense of Government operation in testing this matter, I think it is just and fair and reasonable to take those things into consideration, and yet they are not taken into consideration here, they are given no consideration by the press of the country, and hence they are not understood by the public. You have just the naked facts presented that Government operation cost so much, that Government operation is very expensive.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, would it disturb the Senator to ask a question at this point?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Indeed, it would not.

Mr. GRONNA. If I may preface my inquiry with a statement, I will say that as a rule I am opposed to Government interference in business or in the industries, although I realize that public-service corporations are somewhat different from corporations or individuals engaged in private enterprise. I have been reading the Senator's minority report, and I find on page 11 the following statement:

> If the railroads are returned to the owners under this bill, they go back with a Government guaranty of profit to the private owners amounting to 5½ to 6 per cent on the value.

If the Government of the United States turns the roads back to their owners and permits the owners to increase the salaries of the officers as they see fit, then do I understand the Senator to state that the Government will guarantee a return to the owners of the roads of 5½ or 6 per cent, regardless of whether or not they make it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Absolutely; that is provided in the bill by fixed terms that admit of no variation. In other words, let me say the Interstate Commerce Commission is required so to adjust rates as to pay 5½—nay, 6 per cent—upon the fair value of the roads.

There is no way of ascertaining the fair value of the roads if the provisions of the bill are to be carried out at once as the bill requires, except to take the book accounts of the railroad companies as to their valuation, for the actual valuation provided for by the act of 1913 will not be completed for some three or four years; nobody knows exactly how soon. After it is completed the Interstate Commerce Commission has got to go to the courts in a contest with the railroads, probably as to every single road.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator intends to touch upon that phase of it I shall not further interrupt him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I intend to do so if my time permits.

Mr. GRONNA. But I am at a loss to understand how it would be possible for the Government of the United States and the people of the United States to arrive at any given rate of percentage so long as we do not know what the valuation of the roads is.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But, Mr. President, the Interstate Commerce Commission by the very terms of this bill is required to do that at once and to fix the railroad rates immediately so as to pay that return.

My contention all through the arguments that I made last week was that since the Interstate Commerce Commission has not the true value it has been compelled to take the book value of the railroads as the basis for fixing those returns.

Mr. GRONNA. It must take an arbitrary value, whether high or low.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It must take a value that I will show before I get through is a fraudulent and fictitious value, a padded value, a value that is vastly more than the actual value; and I will show it by the statements of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which have been issued officially to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, if the question is simply what will burden the American people the least, returning the railroads to private hands or keeping them where they are, there can be no doubt about the answer. If we continue Government operation for the next year, you will keep in the pockets of the American people, by any sort of figuring possible under the admitted facts, more than three billion dollars, which you will take out of their pockets and turn over to the railroads if you return the roads to private management. If Mr. Hines's statement as to the multiplied cost of an advanced freight rate by the time it reaches the consumers is true, you will take upward of four billions of dollars out of the pockets of the American people in a short time if you return the roads to the owners; for, mark you, this bill says to the Interstate Commerce Commission, "You shall at once fix rates so as to pay 6 per cent on the value of this property." The Interstate Commerce Commission does not know the value of the property, and they have said in the western advance rate case in 1910, Commissioner Lane writing the opinion, that when it comes to meeting the railroads on the question of the value of their property before the commission shall have officially ascertained the value, they have no answer to the book valuations of the railroads.

I am going to deal with that matter specifically in a few moments, and I am going to show that that is such a wicked, wrongful, dishonest distortion of the true value that to impose it upon the Interstate Commerce Commission now is little short of a raid upon the public.

The bill provides for a net income of from 5½ to 6 per cent upon the value of the railroad properties as determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It requires that the value for the purpose of fixing the rate be immediately determined. It has been admitted by every speaker in behalf of this bill that it will be two or three years before the Interstate Commerce Commission can determine the true value. In the meantime the book value must be accepted, and Senators in their remarks in behalf of this bill all clearly show that they expect that value to be accepted, excepting the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]—I want to except him, for he has never indorsed the book value; he has said again and again that the book value is excessive. But the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] have argued in support of the validity of the book value or investment account of the railroads as showing the fair value of their property. Particularly is that true of the argument made by the Senator from Alabama. That is just what I anticipated, Mr. President. That is the argument that is going to be made before the Interstate Commerce Commission. When by the provisions of this bill you throw upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the duty and the responsibility of immediately finding the value of the railroads in order to fix the 5½ per cent return, they are going to be confronted with the argument made by the Senator from Alabama that the book value is the true value.

That contention had never been made by any Senator before. I do not recall anywhere in any of the debates of Congress that any Senator ever had the hardihood to argue to his associates on this floor that the book values, the investment accounts, of the railroad companies could be considered as anywhere near approaching accuracy as to the value of the properties.

Mr. President, I have dug down into the capitalization of the railroads a bit, and I am going to put the figures in the RECORD in connection with this bill. Let Senators get this in their minds. It is now contended for the first time on this floor that since the bill of 1906, known as the Hepburn-Dolliver bill, was passed, because there was a provision in that bill—and I refer to section 20 of that bill—authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to supervise the bookkeeping of the railroad companies, in order that it should be made uniform, from that time on, from 1907 down to the present time, railroad accounting has been accurate and reliable, being supervised by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I will show by the reports of the commission—and I will read their words to the Senate—that that is not true. And let me say to Senators here, even if it were true, that from 1907 down to this hour the Interstate Commerce Commission have been able so to supervise the bookkeeping of all the railroads as to make a true account of investments, back in 1906 you have all the errors and all the frauds and all the fictitious capitalization carried year after year in those accounts down to this hour. What I mean to say is this: If you become involved in a difference with some one with respect to an accounting, and there is a period within which you have had satisfactory knowledge that the accounts were kept fairly accurately; that that period of time began in 1907 and reached down to 1919, 12 years; but that back of that time there were 50 years of fraud in the accounts, and the fraud stays there; and has never been taken out; if you are asked to make a settlement with your opponent on the basis of the whole account, with its big element of fraud, would you be content to make a settlement on such a basis?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. I desire to ask a question as a matter of information. The Senator knows a great deal, and I know very little.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know much. Few of us here know much. Let me just say that that is the trouble with this business. None of us can sit as experts on the problem with which we are dealing, and that is the reason why I am asking that this subject might be under investigation for a couple of years.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator is informed as very few men are.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am hoping that there might be a commission appointed of real experts on this subject, disinterested experts, who will take it up, make a study of it, and who at the end of a couple of years would be able to make a very informing report to Congress of this whole matter, so that in dealing with this question we should deal with it with some expert knowledge as a basis for our action instead of taking action now based on the inaccurate work of a committee of Congress that is going to fix a certain burden forever upon the American people with regard to this big problem if we adopt it. That is what I am pleading for here.

Mr. McCORMICK. I sought to ask the Senator what bearing the authorized physical valuation of the roads would have on the error antedating the passage of the Hepburn-Dolliver Act?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. This, Mr. President: If the valuation is made with accuracy and justice, it will determine the true investment value of the property of a railroad from its organization to date. It is a large undertaking. It requires time. The act for the valuation of railroads was passed in March, 1913. Down to the present time the Interstate Commerce Commission has reported the value of five little railroads. I have not their names at my tongue's end at this moment, but I put them in the RECORD during my discussion of this subject last week. They are small roads. Those are the only roads that the Interstate Commerce Commission is sufficiently advised about to warrant it in making an order as to their valuation. They are small roads, inconsequential roads. Now, even as to those five roads, the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, entered as their judgment as to the value of those roads, does not settle the value of those roads. Of course, you could not write a law on valuation that would authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the value of railroad property and make it absolute upon their findings, because we have constitutional provisions that no one shall be deprived of property without due process of law, and they might fix a valuation so low, or at least the railroads might so contend, that it would amount to confiscation, and therefore they must have their day in court. So, as to these five roads, they have got to go to court in each of the cases. Now, there have been some proceedings in court already, testing certain principles that the Interstate Commerce Commission is applying in valuation. But even at that every item in each of the valuations of these roads is going to be a subject of contest in the courts, so that, so far as the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission is concerned in valuation, it does not fit into this plan at all, let me say to the Senator from Illinois. This plan requires the Interstate Commerce Commission, on the passage of this bill, to adjust the rates so as to return a given percentage—6 per cent—on the value of railroad property.

How are they going to get it They said again and again to Congress, for 12 or 15 years, that whenever a railroad company in any case before the Interstate Commerce Commission involving the fixing of rates raised the question of valuation, the Interstate Commerce Commission was helpless; that the railroad companies had their books, the Interstate Commerce Commission did not have anything to show to what the railroad companies had put into the property, and therefore they were utterly helpless; and they pleaded with Congress, from 1903 down to 1913, for authority to get the value of railroad property as the only means of correcting the fraud in the book accounts.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. McCORMICK. I only wanted to observe that there are some of us who perhaps have as little taste for this bill as the Senator from Wisconsin, but we do not see clearly to the end of the passage along which he would lead us. We see "through a glass darkly," as the Scripture has it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know. I do not wonder at that. The railroads and the railroad press have been darkening that glass for two years and distorting the facts through it. If the Senator could have the patience to follow me, I believe that I can produce facts here that will entirely sustain my proposition to leave this matter for at least two years in the hands of the Federal Government.

It has been admitted by practically every speaker in behalf of this bill—I think by every speaker—that it will be three years before the Interstate Commerce Commission can report upon railroad valuation. In the meantime the book value, as I contend, must be accepted; and, Senators, the remarks in behalf of this bill of all except the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] clearly show that they expect book value to be accepted, and they are arguing for the validity of book value; and never before this session did anybody ever argue, here or at any other place, unless he was a retained attorney for the railroad companies before the Interstate Commerce Commission, for the validity of book value.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], in discussing this question the other day, frankly said:

> I do not know, and no one else knows, what the whole value of these properties is at the present day.

Take that admission, and then study the terms of this bill, which requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to make rates based on the value of the railroad immediately upon the passage of the bill. The Senator says, "No one knows the whole value of these properties." Yet the majority of the Interstate Commerce Committee wrote into this bill a provision that the Interstate Commerce Commission must immediately find out the actual values of these properties at the present day. Every Member of the Senate knows that it will be years before the Interstate Commerce Commission can comply with that command, and that is now admitted to be so.

Why, then, was any such demand made? Why not have stated frankly that it would be a fictitious and false book value, which would be capitalized under the bill for rate-making purposes. The answer is obvious. Had this been made plainly to appear in the bill, such opposition would have been aroused on the part of the public as would have made the adoption of such a provision impossible. But that provision in the bill is just as effectual as though it had been written out in plain language that in fixing rates to insure the railroads the 6 per cent, the Interstate Commerce Commission should accept the book values or investment accounts of the railroads as the actual value of their properties.

It was said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] that whether we adopted the pending bill or not, the rates must be made, under the Constitution, with reference to the value of the property, and that responsibility will attach to the Interstate Commerce Commission whether the bill is passed or not.

That is true; the Interstate Commerce Commission is directed to make rates according to the correct principles. But everybody knows that the Interstate Commerce Commission can not make rates according to the correct principles, and never has made rates according to correct principles. I mean by that just this, that it never has been able to make a rate that would result in a reasonable return upon the fair value of the property. That is what the Ames case, a Nebraska case, laid down a generation ago as the true measure of a reasonable rate.

If Congress had performed its duty and authorized the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a valuation of railway property, they would have complied with the true principles laid down by the Supreme Court with reference to making reasonable rates. We never have had a reasonable rate made in the United States in the history of rate making by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and every man who understands the first principles of ascertaining reasonable rates knows that is true. What have we had? When the question is raised before the Interstate Commerce Commission as to whether a rate is reasonable or not, they go through the form—and it is a process of juggling for which Congress is responsible because it delayed providing for valuation—they go through the form of merely comparing the questioned rates with existing rates that are not questioned; and then adjusting it so that it is relatively reasonable as compared with other rates, the reasonableness of which they know nothing about, and can ascertain nothing unless they know the value of the property. But because those other rates have not been attacked and assailed, they are made upon the theory that that can be accepted, for the time being, until they have the valuation of the property, as a reasonable rate, and they adjust other rates, where the services are comparable to a reasonable relation, with existing rates. That is what you have had, and it is all you have had.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, am I right in assuming that the rate of profit, the 5½ or 6 per cent, will be a net profit to the roads?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Surely; absolutely. There is no question about that. That is the reason why all the security holders are for this bill. It has been said in the course of this argument that the railroad presidents are not for this bill. They are not for that provision of the bill. They do not like that provision of the bill. At just that point their interests are in conflict with the interests of security holders. But, outside of that, they are emphatically for the provisions of the bill, because, as I traced out when I spoke last week, this bill agrees, section by section—and I can go over it again if it is necessary—with what has been presented to the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, as the demands of the railroads for legislation, ever since 1912. Every major proposition of this bill can be found in the hearings presented to the Interstate Commerce Committee of the United States Senate by Mr. Thom, the attorney for the railroad executives, since 1912, except just one; and what is that? That is the provision covered by section 6, guaranteeing a certain rate to the security holders; and it is at that point that the interests of the security holders and the interests of the railway executives divide and are in conflict.

So anybody can stand up on this floor and say that the railroad executives are not for this bill. They are not for that provision of this bill. They are for every other provision of this bill excepting the one that assures a guaranty of a certain fixed return to the security holders. That was a concession, made by those who framed the bill, to the security holders. In other words, this bill, sir, I undertake to say, is a bill that is in accord with the wishes of the railroad executives.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am perhaps disturbing the Senator, but I am asking these questions for information, for myself especially.

Admitting that the valuation is the dominant factor in the matter of making rates, and assuming, as the Senator has explained, that the book values will be taken, is it not also true that there is another factor which enters into it, and that is operating expenses; for instance, the large salaries which are generally paid to the heads of great corporations? I know that is true with reference to the packing concerns. Some of them receive enormous salaries—$100,000 a year, and so on. What has the Government to say with respect to that?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, this bill does not put any limit upon that at all. This bill puts no limitation on the expenses that can be imposed upon the public with regard to any such features as that. Judge SIMS, of the House, chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce when the House was Democratic, introduced an amendment over there, and it was voted down. His amendment gave a list of all of the railroad officials under private ownership whose salaries were above $20,000 a year; and they ranged all the way from $20,000 up to $120,000; and Representative SIMS, of Tennessee, proposed as an amendment to the Esch bill that no sum for any railway official or railway attorney should be assessed against transportation costs to the public greater than $20,000 a year; and they voted him down.

Mr. President, I would have offered that amendment here if there had been the slightest reason to expect its adoption. I spoke of it last week, but if it could not be voted into the bill over on the House side, where they come up for reelection every two years, there would be little hope of getting it in the bill here. The committee that framed this bill provided no limitations whatever upon the fixed salaries, when these roads go back, that can be continued by the railroad companies and loaded onto the people and taken out of transportation charges.

Then there is another thing they did not do. Mr. President, I wonder if Senators have ever looked into the looting of the railroad companies of this country by railroad officials? There never has been a thoroughgoing investigation of any of the great railroad systems of this country by the Interstate Commerce Commission that did not disclose robbery of the finances of the road on the inside by the railroad officials. That is a serious charge to make, and I suppose that the railway officials are as honest as other corporation officials; but, sir, let me say that there is a difference in the integrity, in the standards, which the officer of a corporation will apply to corporation business, and which that same man will apply to his individual business. Why? Because his individual business stands on his individual honor, and the other is a mere corporate responsibility. It was for that reason, sir, that when we entered upon the era of corporation building in the United States, in the early seventies, corruption was introduced for the first time in the history of the Government. Government had run clean-handed down to that time. There is a difference in the integrity of an individual in his relation to his corporate responsibilities and in his relation to his individual responsibilities.

Why, sir, the Supreme Court of the United States handed down a decision the other day in which they found that one of the leading railroad presidents of the country, whose name has been mentioned in the course of this debate, had committed perjury. That was a case affecting oil lands.

As governor of the State of Wisconsin it became my official duty, in trying to secure equitable and just taxation of railroad property, to review the returns made by the railroads under a law which they had been instrumental in getting passed back in 1854, when the State was only 6 years old, written on the statute books and kept there until I became governor of the State, when the basis of taxation was changed. Under the terms of that law the presidents of the railroads filed statements with the State of Wisconsin. They filed with the State treasurer false affidavits with respect to their returns. They were just as good men as you could find anywhere in the United States in official positions as important as that.

By a special message sent to the legislature I secured the passage of a bill giving to the State the right to put bookkeepers and accountants into their offices in Chicago and elsewhere to inspect their books and see whether they had made honest returns. They resisted it. Fortunately a provision was put in those bills that if they refused to let us have access to their books their charters in the State of Wisconsin should be annulled.

Finally, after a delay of six weeks, during which time there is no question that vouchers were made away with and changes made in their records, we got access to their books, and we found that in the case of every single railroad in the State of Wisconsin perjured affidavits had been filed with respect to their earnings in that State upon which they were paying taxes under the old law of 1854.

So I say that you have this question to deal with, and, coming back to the bill, I say that wherever you have got to depend upon the official records and railway accounts and book values and the official testimony of corporate officials you have got to be on your guard every moment if you are going to serve the public interest.

The bill does not provide against excessive salaries. It guarantees to capital and to the railroads certain returns. It guarantees nothing to the public. It does not say to the public that it shall have a fair show in the matter of expenses. It does not say to the public that there shall not be any more robbing of the railroads from the inside.

Why, Mr. President, there never has been a railroad corporation investigated by the Interstate Commerce Commission that they did not find that the officials of the road—the managers of the road—were interested in inside corporations that were furnishing supplies to the railroad and charging two or three times what they were worth and furnishing an inferior character of supplies and eating the railroad up from the inside, robbing the stockholders and the public alike.

That is the history of a number of these roads. It is the history of the New Haven; it is the history of the Illinois Central. The records of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission demonstrate what I say. It is the history of the Alton; it is the history of the Frisco; it is the history of every road that has been investigated. Yet there is no provision in the bill protecting the public against the continued looting of the railroads of the country by inside manipulation.

Mr. President, it is not a question, I say, of whether you are in favor of Government operation or in favor of private operation; but surely you ought to be in favor of wise legislation dealing with this problem when you hand the railroads back to their owners; and I undertake to say that we have nothing in this bill which insures honest dealing with the public.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). Does the Senafor from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. On yesterday, in some remarks I submitted to the Senate, I complained rather bitterly that the Interstate Commerce Committee had not presented to the Senate any hearings taken upon the bill which were calculated to reasonably enlighten the Senate as to its provisions. I was told by the chairman of the committee in reply that the Interstate Commerce Committee had had elaborate hearings.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me state this on my honor as a Member of the Senate. The extra session adjourned on the 19th of November. During that extra session, and I think along about June, possibly earlier than that—we met on the 19th of May, as I now remember—a subcommittee of five was appointed to prepare a bill. The subcommittee prepared the bill and turned it into the full committee on the 2d of September. It was introduced in the Senate and referred back to the full committee.

I think there were some hearings—I mean that I think the subcommittee of five had some advice, some counsel, some assistance in drawing the bill, but not one word taken down in shorthand. You can go up to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and you can not find a line of testimony taken by the subcommittee.

Then we came to the full committee with the bill presented to it. Agricultural interests asked for a hearing, shipping interests asked for a hearing, labor interests asked for a hearing, various other interests asked for a hearing. A vote was taken upon it. I made the motion that we have public hearings; that if it was necessary that we should make haste that they be limited, but that such a bill as this ought not to be brought in unless hearings had been given to the public; that however much we had had hearings upon the Government taking over the railroads and what the Government had done with them before—and there are three or four volumes of that—they did not bear on this bill; that this was a bill for Congress to pass upon and there ought to be hearings upon it, and the public ought to have a chance to be informed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, as I understand the Senator——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a word further. I made the motion that there should be hearings upon it in response to demands that had come to me. I was voted down. One other member of the committee, who was lately presiding here in the Senate, voted with me for hearings. I think it is proper for me to say as much as that. All the other members of the committee voted against me.

Then they voted finally to give hearings—limited hearings—to the railroad brotherhoods on the strike provision, section 30, limited strictly to that, and parts of two days' hearings were given on that, and those hearings are printed. Those are all the hearings had before the Committee on Interstate Commerce that are printed. I think Mr. Thom filed a written brief; former Justice Hughes filed a written brief on one section of the bill and two or three other lawyers filed briefs, but we had no hearings.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I understand the Senator, the statement which I made yesterday, that there had been no hearings upon the specific bill except those which related to the strike provisions, is substantially correct?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Absolutely correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. My understanding at the time I made the statement was that the committee had, previous to the preparation of the bill and its presentation to the committee by the subcommittee charged with the duty of framing it, held some investigation or some hearings, but that those hearings related to the general subject——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly.

Mr. SIMMONS. And not to the specific provisions of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, it could not have been considered in those hearings, because no one at that time knew that the bill would be framed in this particular form.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly; that is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. So it brings itself down to this, that we have a bill here dealing specifically with many phases of the railroad questions in a new and untried way, and we have had no hearings with reference to the proposed innovations upon our former system of controlling and regulating railroads except as relates to the strike provision of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is absolutely true, except that the committee of five may have had some private hearings, but no stenographic report of those hearings was accessible to any member of the committee and, of course, not to the Senate, and they might as well not have been held, if they had any.

Mr. SIMMONS. So that so far as the essential provisions of the bill are concerned, barring the one just spoken of, the Senate is called upon, after a debate of 10 days, probably, to pass a bill dealing most comprehensively with the question of what is to be done with the railroads hereafter and what part the Government is to take in their management.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is absolutely true.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator if he thinks that with this lack of information and data upon which to base our action we ought to be precipitated into a hurried vote upon the measure?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am unable to characterize the forcing of the Senate to pass upon the bill as I feel it ought to be characterized and still keep within the rules of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me say to the Senator that on yesterday I sought to elicit some information with reference to what to my mind is the most vital provision of the bill, and I was unable to get even an approximate prediction. To my mind there is no provision in the bill quite so important as that which relates to the imposition of a rate, which will have to be paid by all of the people of the country, sufficient to enable the railroads to earn 5 or 6 per cent upon the value of their property. I think it is of fundamental importance to have some information that will enable us to determine with some degree of accuracy how much the present high traffic rates that have been inaugurated by the Government during its control of the roads will have to be increased; and if they have to be increased, what will be the effect of those increases upon the cost of living. It is admitted, it was admitted here yesterday, that if there is an additional increase of rates, that increase will be reflected in the cost of products not once but possibly several times. The people of the country ought to know whether, while talking about reducing the cost of living, we are proposing the imposition of high freight rates, which will enormously increase that cost; and yet we do not seem to have any information on that subject.

The Senator says to-day in his discussion—and that raises a new question—and he states it correctly, that this bill provides for a certain per cent of earnings upon the value of the property of the railroads. That must mean the present value of those properties. Has there been any inquiry made by the committee or by anybody else for the committee as to what would be the possible increase in the value of railroad property to-day as compared with its value during the prewar period? Are the present values to be ascertained by what it would cost to duplicate the railroads?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course, interrupting the Senator at that point, if the roads were to be reproduced at the present costs prevailing in this country for everything the capitalization would be almost doubled.

Mr. SIMMONS. It would be almost doubled, and therefore the rates, in order to yield 5½ per cent return, would have to be twice as much as upon the original value. Is that contemplated? Does the bill mean that? If it does not mean that, it ought to say it does not mean it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think so, too.

Mr. SIMMONS. We are not in a position to ascertain or even to form a conclusion as to what extent the bill will require rates to be increased until we have some information about that question. I should be very glad to hear the Senator elaborate that proposition a little bit further.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I had given quite a bit of time to that, I think, before the Senator came upon the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, so far as the book values are concerned, I suppose they are the book values that the railroads have been carrying for some time?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. And the railroads, doubtless, would not be satisfied with those values for the purposes of this bill? They would say, "This bill proceeds on the basis of present values, while the book values are the values that obtained before the great enhancement in the cost of commodities in this country. Therefore, we are entitled to a revision of those book values."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. I think the bill is fairly open to that construction by making "the present value" the basis of computation. I discussed that somewhat in my argument before the Senate last week. The present value of building any railroad in the United States would be vastly more than the investment or book value, probably, although the book values run, doubtless, some 40 to 50 per cent more than the actual investment. I do not think there is any doubt about that. As I progress I am going to discuss the book values to some extent, because we have got to take one or the other; we have either got to take the book value, the investment account, or else we have got to take the present value. The bill says the value of the railroads.

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill says "the value," which means the present value, I take it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. The railroads may insist that you have got to take that in order to make a correct basis for fixing the percentage which the bill provides, or you have got to approximate the present cost of reproduction of these properties. They will contend for either one or the other. I do not know whether or not they will be satisfied with the investment account. If they are, even at that they will receive a rate vastly beyond any investment which they have actually made in these properties. I was just upon the point of calling attention to the fact that the bill does not provide for any of the excessive expenses that the railroad companies may saddle upon the public, and it does not provide for any of the graft that investigations of the Interstate Commerce Commission have disclosed exist in such great railroad systems as the Illinois Central, the Alton, the Frisco, the New Haven, and a long list of other roads that have been subject to investigation. No check whatever is provided in the bill on that side.

The railroads are taken care of; the stockholders are taken care of; but it does seem to me—and I say it with no desire to make personal reflections—that the public is not protected in this bill any more than labor is protected in this bill.

Now, Mr. President, to resume the line of my argument, because I must hasten on——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I wish to state that I do not mean to say that I believe section 6 is wholly bad. I am inclined to think that section 6 probably contains a framework which could be made use of so as to be a most valuable provision in this bill, if this bill is to be adopted; but I do not think we have the information at this time to enable us to adjust section 6 to this bill so that the interests of the public will be surely safeguarded and protected.

I do not know what I might do with reference to this bill if we could have time to discuss it and have time to get that information which I feel I should like to have, and which I think the Senate ought to have before it acts. If I am forced, as it seems that I will be forced this afternoon, to vote upon this bill without what I consider necessary and essential information to enable me to decide the questions that are troubling me, I shall be forced to cast my vote against it. I wanted to vote for the bill if I could. There are some provisions in it I never could vote for, except as it became necessary to vote for them to get other provisions; but there are some provisions I should like to vote for, provided I feel that I can safely vote for them without shouldering upon the people of this country a great burden of taxation; for railroad rates are taxes, and if they are excessive they are taxes of a most obnoxious character, because they are all-pervading—nobody escapes them. I want, when I vote for a proposition that levies that kind of taxes, to know what I am voting for; I want to know that the rate I am voting for is a just, compensatory rate, and not an extortionate and burdensome exaction upon the people of this country.

I have not the data and can not get them; nobody upon the committee seems to be able to supply them to us; they have furnished us no information in their hearings that supply them.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. May I suggest to the Senator, too, that, being a tax, it comes out of the public; but if there is an excess, it goes to private corporations.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; the Senator makes the point, and it is a very good point, that the excess, if there is an excess, is recoverable by the Government in this case instead of by the shipper, as under the present law, and goes not to the man who bore the burden, who is subjected to the unjust exaction, but to some corporation. I am not at this time complaining of that. There may be compensatory features in that, especially if the Government should use the fund for the purpose of creating an equipment service that could be rendered to corporations as they might need it in order to overcome congestion and temporary lack of sufficient facilities to meet the demands that might be made upon them. It might be that such a use of the funds would operate in the interest of the shipper who had been required to make the payment, in the sense that he would get the benefit of better service; but, even in that case, one individual might be required to contribute more than his share to the public benefit that would be derived.

That, however, is not what is troubling me. The thing that is troubling me is that we are required here to take a step in the dark with reference to the imposition upon the people of this country of a rate of railroad taxation, without knowing in advance whether that rate is going to be a reasonable rate or an excessive rate; and that is very much emphasized by the fact the Senator has brought out here—a fact that had occurred to me, but I had not alluded to it in my remarks yesterday—that under this bill nobody can foresee to what extent the present estimated value of the railroad properties of this country, for the purpose of carrying out this section of the bill, will have to be revised, and, if revised, how many times, how much it will be increased, or how many times it will be multiplied.

We know that at this time in many sections of the country, probably in all sections of the country, values are enormously inflated. Real property selling in the prewar period for $100 an acre can not be purchased now for twice that amount in many sections of the country; in some sections, not for three times that much. I take it that the value of railroad property has increased, the intrinsic value, the market value—and the reasonable inference from the language of this bill is that the market value is meant—that the market value of the physical property of the roads of this country and the intangible property of the roads of this country has increased in proportion to the increase that has taken place in other properties and commodities, and that when we go to impose this rate that will permit these corporations to make 5½ and 6 per cent upon the value of their properties, the value of their properties will have to be determined by the inflated values that obtain now.

There ought to have been some investigation about that. The members of the Interstate Commerce Commission could have thrown light upon both of these questions—both the question of how much the value of the property would have to be increased, and the question of how much the rates would have to be increased over the present high rates. I suppose they were not called. I suppose the committee has not heard from them. Why this hurry, why this indecent haste, when you consider this demand here for immediate action in conjunction with the precedents and the customs and the habits of this body as a deliberative body to discuss proposed legislation freely, deliberately, and with all the time that may be deemed necessary by any Senator upon the floor before action is forced?

Mr. President, I had been seriously considering at one time supporting this bill; but when I began to investigate it, and these questions began to occur to me, I reached the conclusion that if forced to vote now I could not safely vote for it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I only regret that there are not more Members of this body who feel in the same keen and personal way the responsibilities of their official obligations.

Mr. President, when diverted from the line of my argument I was directing attention to the statement made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. The statement of the distinguished Senator was very guarded. He does not say that the Interstate Commerce Commission fixes rates now upon the actual value of the railroad property, because he knows that statement would be palpably wrong. The whole point of his general statement means, if it means anything, that the Interstate Commerce Commission is under the same obligation substantially now that it would be under the terms of this bill. This, however, I submit, is wholly erroneous. What the Interstate Commerce Commission does now when any particular controversy arises is to fix the rate primarily in relation to an existing rate, and to determine its reasonableness with regard to an existing rate. It also takes into consideration other facts as it may find them. I remember that in one celebrated case the Interstate Commerce Commission took into consideration the value that we had placed upon the railroads of Wisconsin under the State law. The Interstate Commerce Commission makes no pretense now of fixing a rate upon the value of the property so as to provide a certain specific return. The latter thing is what this bill compels them to do; and when they are compelled to do that and do it at once, when the railroads stand ready with the proof in their hands, their book value, their investment account, and the public and the shipper have nothing to submit to combat that proof, every Senator must know that the practical result of it is going to be that the railroads' proof will be accepted.

But that is not all. This 5½ and 6 per cent, which the railroads are to get upon the value of their property, as determined, is fixed for a period of five years. I refer to the top of page 18 of the bill; not the reprint, but the original bill in the form in which we took it up for consideration in the Senate.

It may appear within that time, if the railroads' valuation shall be completed, that 5½ or 6 per cent is all wrong, was an unreasonable rate, an improper rate, and yet the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission are tied, and the hands of the Government and of the people are tied, and their roads are guaranteed an absolute return for five years. So I assert that there is not the least similarity between the rate-making power or duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the present law and what it would be under the terms of this bill, if it should become a law. In one case the rate fixed may be temporary, subject to modification. In the other it is fixed so as to yield a flat return for a period of five years.

In the one case the reasonableness of the return is determined by the existing rates, primarily, which have been acquiesced in, or to which no attention has been paid, and by many other facts and circumstances, while in the other case the reasonableness of the rate must be determined upon the book values or investment account.

Mr. President, now I want to turn for a moment to the investment account, and in that connection I want to direct the attention of Senators to the fact that the investment account is defended on this floor by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, formerly leader of his party in the House of Representatives.

I suppose his distinguished services in this body, if we may take account of report, will shortly invest him with the leadership upon the Democratic side; and I will say that it can not be placed in abler hands.

But I want to note the fact that the distinguished Senator from Alabama—and I think his frankness is to be commended—defended on this floor the investment accounts of the railroads as a reasonable measure of the value of their property. Not every member of the committee spoke out in the same candid way.

Mr. President, that is what is to be made the basis of the rate which section 6 is going to fasten upon the people of this country, unless, as suggested a short time ago in the colloquy which I had with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the railroads should press for the technical right which the terms of this bill would give them, and that is the present value of the property, the inflated value of their property, the value of their property measured by a 50-cent dollar.

They may stand upon section 6 before the Interstate Commerce Commission and say: "Our book values, in round numbers, showing that we have invested 18 billions in railroad property, shall be taken as the base of our investment. But in addition to that we are entitled, by the terms of this bill, to the present value of these roads. If that is what we invested when values were 50 per cent lower than they are now, a hundred per cent lower in many things than they are now, we may rightfully claim in addition to our book or investment accounts, as the present value of our property, 24 or 25 billions." I do not know how much or how they would reckon out or arrive at the demands which they will press.

The bill says the value of their property; that means the present value. There is no possibility of the Interstate Commerce Commission ascertaining the value guided by what they invested 10, 20, 30, or 50 years ago, some of them 70 years ago. The value now, the value to-day, at this hour, is what this bill says. And it will either be the book values, the investment account, or else it will be something larger than that, based upon the inflated condition of values to-day.

The Senator from Alabama argued it upon the basis of the investment account, and I refer to his argument as it appears on page 679 of the RECORD of December 16.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is correct in stating that I took the investment account as the basis of my argument. Of course, the bill provides for real value. We do not know what the real value is; that is to be ascertained by the commission. I suggested that possibly the commission would find that the investment account would approximate the real value, and then based my argument on that. But I am not prepared to agree to any proposition in reference to the basis of fixing rates that goes beyond real value. I think it is just that they should have their return on the real value of their property.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but the Senator must agree with me that there is no method by which the real value can be ascertained to-day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is difficult of ascertainment; but I think in the interests of the American people we must make an effort to ascertain what it is.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me ask the Senator from Alabama how he would ascertain it immediately, under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am free to say that I do not think immediately—I mean within the hour that the bill goes through, or I may go further and say within the year that the bill goes through—it can be accurately ascertained; and it is not contemplated that it should be accurately ascertained in that hour. For the purpose of running the railroads pending a final ascertainment the commission will have to take the best evidences of values they have, as any other man would. But in the end the bill contemplates that they shall ascertain the real value.

I know of no one else that can do it. We can not do it. We can not leave it to the owners of the properties to do it. The only way it can be done in the end, in my judgment, is to leave it to a governmental commission. I am willing to trust the Interstate Commerce Commission to act in the matter. I think they have fairly and in the main represented the people of the United States in the past.

But I do not stand on this particular commission. If somebody can show me a fairer way of appointing a governmental commission to ascertain values, I shall be glad to accede to it. The principle, as I contend, whether you buy the railroads ultimately if you stand for Government ownership, or whether you establish a permanent return in private hands, is that the real value of the properties must be found now, and no unearned increment added to them in the future. The only way to do that is by a fair ascertainment of real value, because there is value there, there must be real value there, and the men who have owned the real value are entitled to a reasonable return on it. I do not think the Senator from Wisconsin will disagree with me in that statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That means, as I understand it, that the Interstate Commerce Commission by the terms of the bill is directed to find the real value of the railroad property. It is required to fix rates based upon that value so that the rates will return 6 per cent upon the outstanding securities of the railroad companies.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him further?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know that a great many people visualize the bill in the idea that it contemplates a return on the value of the securities. As I understand the bill, that is not so. The bill contemplates a 6 per cent return, so far as the earning is concerned, on the value of the property. One railroad may be undercapitalized. If that is so, it would get 6 per cent on the value of its property, and, being undercapitalized, it would get more than 6 per cent on its securities. If it is overcapitalized with watered stock, it would get 6 per cent on its value and vastly less on its securities.

So the question as to whether it has watered stock is not a question involved in this equation. It is a question of paying them 6 per cent, or, rather, of allowing them to earn 6 per cent, because we do not pay it; they must earn it, if they can, on the value of their property. I am free to say I do not think in this day and hour that that is an unreasonable proposition.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The point is, however, that the Interstate Commerce Commission is required to ascertain the real value or the value of the railroad property now, and to make a rate that shall insure the return provided for in the bill. You can not get away from the proposition that the Interstate Commerce Commission has no means of getting the value of the railroad property under the bill excepting that it take the value proven by the railroad companies of the country, namely, their investment accounts.

So it is that the Senator from Alabama, accepting that situation, in his address the other day very candidly defended, as I read his statement, the investment account as a fair basis for the value of the railroad property.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to say to the Senator that I know nothing myself as to whether their investment account is a fair value. It is probably what the commission would take, or approximately take, in the period pending the ascertainment of real value, and therefore I merely take that statement as a basis for my argument because I know of no other. But I have been told that the commission would probably approximate some position of that kind. It might be a billion dollars over or it might be several billion dollars under, but that is approximately what would be the basis until the final equation is arrived at. To that extent I say there is no other basis that I know of for the temporary ascertainment of this value, and we must have some basis to go on.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the inherent candor of the Senator from Alabama compels him to make that statement. He can not make any other. He is intellectually honest, therefore he says that until they get some other basis the Interstate Commerce Commission will be compelled to accept as the value of the property investment accounts. That is what he argued here the other day.

Now, I agree with him; I think they have to take that. Under the terms of the bill they are forced to do it. They have nothing else, and will not have for years any scientific basis of value with which to correct the iniquities of these values. I am going to show their iniquity now. I am going to show that no one ought to stand for these investment accounts as a basis for a 6 per cent return to the railroads.

Mark you, the railroad companies all say that they have to have immediate action that shall enable them to finance their properties. Why, they are running great half-page and full-page advertisements with the view of preparing the public for the enormous increases that are going to be made in freight rates in order to put their securities upon the market.

The Interstate Commerce Commission can not wait three years or five years or eight years for a completion of valuation and decisions by the Supreme Court in the case of every single railroad valuation, because the valuation fixed upon every one of the roads will be contested and taken to the courts. So in view of the statement of the Senator from Alabama the Interstate Commerce Commission will be forced to accept these investment accounts as the basis of the value of the railroad.

I stand before the Senate this afternoon and say that the investment accounts of the railroad companies are impeached, a thousand times impeached. They are fraudulent. By the friends of the railroads they are admitted to be fraudulent. By the friends of the Interstate Commerce Commission they are declared to be fraudulent and fictitious, and I am going to put that proof in the RECORD.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator just a moment to ask if he knows how far the Interstate Commerce Commission has gone with ascertaining the true value of railroad properties?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I stated a little while ago—the Senator was out just for the moment when I made the statement—that they have ascertained the value in a way to warrant their making an order finding the value of four or five little railroads in the country. The act was passed in 1913. They are five small roads, quite inconsequential, really, but that is as far as they have gotten.

The Senator knows, of course, as a lawyer that each one of those roads will have the right to go to the Supreme Court of the United States to determine whether the value fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission is confiscatory or not.

We undertook a great economic problem when we essayed the valuation of the railroads of the United States. It is going to take years to do it. It may be well done, it may be fairly well done, it may be badly done, but it is going to be done, and I presume the generations to come are going to be bound in a measure by it. I hope it will be well done, but it is not going to be any guide to the Interstate Commerce Commission in carrying out the provisions of this bill. Let every Senator get that out of his mind if he has had it there.

That is what this bill says: "Do it now, not next year, not the year after, not 5 years from now or 10 years from now, when the railway valuation is ascertained." Those roads will be pressing at once for financial aid. The railroad presidents are already running advertisements filling pages of the daily papers. I quoted one of them the other day, that of the president of the Southern Pacific road. They want $742,000,000 increase in rates. They want it now; they are going to demand it now. They have been pressing Hines to grant that increase before the roads go back to their owners. He has refused. They are going to be knocking at the doors of the Interstate Commerce Commission and demanding this increase in rates, amounting to three-quarters of a billion of dollars. They are going to say to the commission: "Here is a law of Congress which is known as the Cummins bill, which requires you to pay us 6 per cent upon the value of our property to-day. We are not going to wait for you for the long process of valuation and fighting it out in the courts. This law says you shall give us 6 per cent on the value to-day. Give it to us. We have got to have it or we shall go into the hands of receivers and a great financial panic will follow." All of the power of these mighty railroad organizations will be brought to bear upon the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. President, do you know what that means? Let me remind Senators that only three or four years ago the Interstate Commerce Commission was besieged for an increase in rates. Upon the hearings held they decided that the increase was not warranted; that the rates were already reasonable. Then what happened? There was turned upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, a quasi-judicial body, such a campaign of assault and contumely as was never before witnessed in the United States.

Think, sir, of the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission being called out of his bed at midnight and presented with a demand to grant the increases that the railroads wanted! That commission was literally swamped with demands that they grant the increase or resign. I introduced a resolution on this floor asking that communications improperly sent to the commission demanding that they decide in favor of the railroad companies without any adjudication be transmitted to the Senate. They came. On the day they came my desk and the adjoining desks here were piled full to overflowing with these outrageous demands upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. Every single organization in the United States connected with stock exchanges, commercial organizations, bankers' organizations, real estate associations, had sent these demands to the Interstate Commerce Commission that they decide in favor of the railroads. What do you think of that? Do you remember it? Not many Senators were present. I put those infamous documents which had been sent here by the Interstate Commerce Commission in response to the order of the Senate into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There are 175 pages of infamy; it took 175 pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to print the demands that were hurled at the Interstate Commerce Commission in the advance rate cases in 1913 ordering them to decide in favor of the railroads or to resign. That was the character of those communications. One of them was a full-page advertisement by the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, of which Hurley, afterwards put on the Federal Trade Commission, was president. He was president at the time that advertisement was inserted. What did that advertisement say? It said substantially this: "Write your Members, wire your Members and your Senators, and demand of the Interstate Commerce Commission that they decide the pending application in favor of the railroads."

To pass upon differences between the railroads and the public with regard to rates, fares, and charges, Congress raised a great commission. Whom did they put on that commission? From memory I can not name them all, although I was a Member of the other House when that commission was created. I know, however, that Cooley, of Michigan, was one of the original members of that commission; I know that Morrison, of Illinois, was another. They were great men; there were five of them.

Mr. OVERMAN. Judson C. Clements, of Georgia, was subsequently a member of the commission.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me say to you that you are turning over this question of fastening upon the people of the country burdens based upon rottenness and fraudulent overcapitalization to the Interstate Commerce Commission and you are leaving the present members of that commission naked and defenseless against attacks of this kind.

Why, do you know, Mr. President, there was established by the railroads over in Philadelphia a bureau that issued a bulletin every month? They flooded the country with their "dope" demanding an increase in rates. They were after more money. Where do you suppose that campaign culminated? They did not hesitate at anything; they went to the White House and demanded of the President that he interfere in the proceedings of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The record I made when I printed those documents shows it, and I challenge contradiction.

Mr. President, when I spoke last week I said that the valuation would be demanded by the railroads upon their book investments. Their book investments are rotten beyond all measure. I did not then expect that Senators would rise on this floor and confirm me by arguing for the validity of those book investments. The Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Alabama have done so; so that we may assume that that is what we are going to be confronted with if we dare to pass this bill.

If investment accounts and book values as kept by the railroads—and those are synonymous terms—are to be accepted as the basis for the value upon which the people of this country are to pay 6 per cent just as soon as the machinery can be set in motion after this bill is passed, then there are just two things that I should like Senators to get in their minds: First, investment accounts and book values can be properly divided into two classes, those made before 1906 and those made after 1906.

In 1906 we passed a law known as the Hepburn-Dolliver law. It was not worth the paper it was written on excepting for one section. Just one section in it was valuable. That was section 20. That is not my estimate of it. That is the estimate of Commissioner Prouty, one of the ablest men who ever sat on the Interstate Commerce Commission. Shortly after the act was passed he wrote a magazine article putting an estimate on the results of that legislation. They had been a long time getting it, and he wanted to sort of sum it up, boil it down, and say what had been achieved after all these years from 1887 down to 1906, and he said just this: "The act is more conspicuous for what it does not do than for what it does do"; and then he said: "There is one thing of value in the act, and that is section 20."

What was section 20 in the Hepburn-Dolliver revision of the interstate-commerce law? It was this, that the Interstate Commerce Commission should have a right to require the railroads to keep a uniform system of books in a uniform way, to the end that the Interstate Commerce Commission could keep better track of their finances. So that back of 1906 you have, in all of their accounts, items that had no supervision from anybody. If you take book investments to-day, you have book investment with all the fraud and iniquity from about 1830 or 1835 down to 1906. You have all of that long era of unrestrained fraud as the foundation of the book values and investment accounts of the railroads. It never has been taken out. It is there now.

You can not make any just settlement with a man with whom you have a controversy on accounts if half his accounts are fraudulent and the other half are half fraudulent. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said, in the course of his remarks, that since 1906, under the Hepburn-Dolliver Act, there has been a supervision of railroad accounts. I am going to read you what the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission say about it. They say that the supervision was not a half supervision. They say that they could not tell much about it from that time down to this. It has improved somewhat, because they have had some supervision, but they say that Congress has cut them down so on their appropriations for accounts to look into the accounts of the railroads that they could not keep up with the railroads. Therefore even since 1906, when the terms of the Hepburn-Dolliver Act gave the Interstate Commerce Commission supervision over railroad companies the check upon the purse strings has kept the force so small that they could not supervise them, they could only look in here and there; they could only pick a few railroad companies and revise their accounts. Now, that policy comes back to plague us—penny-wise and pound-foolish. The Interstate Commerce Commission pleaded for more accountants, pleaded for ability to supervise these accounts under the Hepburn-Dolliver Act of 1906, and the Appropriations Committees of Congress every year cut down their appropriations so that they could not supervise them.

I am going to take you as rapidly as I can over the period before we began any supervision of these accounts. I am going to offer testimony from the railroad authorities—Poor's Manual; Van Oss, a British statistician who wrote a book on investment in railway securities, and wrote it for the protection of the British investor.

The railroads are capitalized, in round numbers, for $19,000,000,000. The public believes that this capitalization grossly exceeds the fair value of the property; that it has been wrongfully watered and inflated; and that the producers and consumers of the country are unjustly taxed on transportation to pay an income upon a false and fraudulent valuation. The railroads deny this claim. That makes a sharp and conflicting issue between the public and the railroads.

Now, mark you, I am going to deal with conditions up to 1906, and then I am going to deal with them afterwards on the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to how much supervision they have been able to exercise over the accounts of railroads from that time down to this, because, Senators, you are going to vote presently to pass a bill that shall direct and compel the Interstate Commerce Commission to assess rates against the American public on the present value of the railroad property. I shall present in this connection evidence of the overcapitalization, inflation, and watering of many of the railroad properties of the country. I shall go into the subject fully enough to impeach the standing capitalization, or book values, of the railroad property of the country. The falsity of any representation which speaks of railway capitalization as railway investment becomes readily apparent when a few instances are cited to show the nature and source of the capitalization of some of the leading railroads.

Take the case of the Wilmington & Dalton, a North Carolina railroad. The road was originally capitalized on such a basis that its stock afterwards sold at $40 per share. The earnings were forced up, however, and when the road became important it was merged into the Atlantic Coast Line road, and $400 of new stock issued for every $100 of the old stock which had in past years been calling for $40 a share.

Probably everyone is familiar with the history of the making of millions of Erie stock by Daniel Drew, the treasurer of the road, to pay a gambling debt. He had sold "short" to Vanderbilt, who was trying to get entire control of the road; and when Drew found out that Vanderbilt had cornered all the stock in sight, he got a printing press and made enough more Erie stock to satisfy the obligation.

Oh, you will tell me, as some of the Senators who advocate this bill have said in the course of this debate, that there has been iniquity in bygone years, but that it is stopped now. But that iniquity is in the railroad investment account, and you are called upon to pass a bill that will force the Interstate Commerce Commission to fall back on that kind of evidence in order to find value; and this generation is asked to fix transportation charges high enough to pay interest and dividends on railroad securities created in this manner.

An examination of financial newspaper files will show advertisements of reorganization committee announcements about as follows—and I quote from one of those old advertisements:

> The reorganization committee will issue $1,000 of new 6 per cent bonds, $1,000 of 6 per cent preferred stock, and $1,000 of new common stock, in exchange for each $1,000 of 6 per cent old bonds.

That is taken from the actual advertisement. Some interesting evidence on this question was given before the Cullom committee in 1886. Mr. O'Dunn, of the New York State Central Railroad Commission, called attention to the watered capitalization of the Erie Railroad in the following language:

> They increased their capital one year over $30,000,000, and the reason they gave was that they had to lay down steel rails. In the vernacular of the newspapers at the time, they spelt steel rails "s-t-e-a-l."

Dare you pass a bill that hands that on as a burden to the people of this country upon which 6 per cent shall be paid? You will have to answer some questions to your constituents if you take that course.

I do not care what you are in favor of—Government ownership, private ownership, what not—you can not be in favor of a bill of this kind. You had better let the roads stay where they are, paying more than they ought to pay under the standard return contracts, until you can mature legislation that is decent and righteous as between the railroads and the people.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator just a moment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Has there ever been any policy on the part of any of the railroads to charge off the profit and loss from time to time?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Never. I undertake to say that if you trace their accounts you will find this watered stock, this fraudulent, fictitious stock, handed down decade after decade, statement after statement. It is there, and that is what you are called upon to approve in this bill. Otherwise I would have no reason to be going into it here.

I do not ask you to take my authority for that statement. I will quote the Interstate Commerce Commission in just a few minutes. However much supervision they may give, it does not cure the festering corruption in the accounts back of 1906. It is there. It is there forever, until you get a true valuation, an honest valuation, of railroad property. You are not permitted to have that now, you can not get it for years. But you are going to fix 6 per cent as a burden upon the property of this country, upon a value to be ascertained at once by the Interstate Commerce Commission, by the terms of this bill.

Mr. H. V. Poor, the author of Poor's Manual of Railroads, in his statement before the Cullom committee in 1886, pointed out that most of this fictitious capital has been issued in defiance and immediately in violation of charter provisions.

I am about to quote from Poor's Manual, high authority, never prejudiced against the railroads. You can not find a broker's office in the United States where Poor's Manual is not kept as a ready reference and guide. He says:

The reasons for such provisions are obvious. Railroads have virtually the power of taxing the people. The object of such provisions is to limit this power of taxation to fair returns upon the capital actually invested. The common way in which such a wholesale provision of the law is avoided is by contracts for construction, in which the promoters of the railroad to be built are really the contractors, receiving the gross amount of stocks and bonds, twice or thrice greater, perhaps, than the cash cost of the road.

As an illustration of such fictitious capitalization, Mr. Poor cited the Pacific roads chartered by Congress. In the act chartering the several companies it was provided that the share of capital should be subscribed for bona fide, and that the full nominal value of the same should be paid in cash. That was the condition of the charter. A congressional investigation of the Union Pacific showed that the stock of the company was issued chiefly to the directors of the road under a contract for construction without consideration.

The committee reported to the House that the issuing of this stock in violation of law justified the abrogation of the company's charter. It was not abrogated. The railroads were here; they have been here for a good while. I am wondering whether they are here now. The record will tell the story.

The Northern Pacific, under like charter restrictions, divided the whole nominal amount of one hundred millions of its capital stock among the promoters of the enterprise, little or nothing being paid thereon, before any considerable expenditure was made upon the road at all.

The Central Pacific was likewise constructed by the promoters and the greater part of the stock issued to them as a gratuity.

The water in the Erie is described by Mr. Poor as the difference between the par value of $55,000,000 of bonds, $1,000 each, and the price, $350 each, at which they were sold, or, in all, about $36,000,000.

The New York Central secured a special act of the New York Legislature which allowed some $48,000,000 of water to be added to the capitalization of their property in violation of the constitution and charter provisions. Just think of it.

The promoters of the New York, West Shore & Buffalo Railroad divided the $40,000,000 capital stock of that company as a part merely of their profits to be received under a construction contract.

The greater part of the share capital—fifty million—of the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad was issued in like manner as a profit to the promoters, says Mr. Poor.

Poor's Manual states further:

Another mode of issuing water was that adopted by the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Co., which, without the payment of any considerable sum into the treasury, increased its share capital from $1,900,000 to $44,000,000, the occasion of the increase being the purchase of or consolidation with some other line.

Previously, in his manual for 1884, Mr. Poor had given careful attention to this question, and as a result of his investigations stated that the true investment in our railroads did not exceed the amount of the bonded indebtedness.

In a subsequent estimate, before the Cullom committee, Mr. Poor somewhat reduced the proportion of the fictitious capitalization in the foregoing statement, because there is a tremendous amount of water in railroad bonds. You know what they do. They issue a certain amount of bonds to build a certain railroad; they issue $100,000,000 of bonds. They do not bring them to you and to me to put in the road, for they know they are not going to put that amount of money into the roads. Mr. Morgan is going to give them only such and such a portion, maybe he will take 10 per cent rake-off, maybe it will be 15 per cent, but it is after he gets through with it and after the other fellows get through with it that there goes into the road a certain amount of money, but it is never the face value of the bonds. That is what is meant here by the statement.

But Mr. Poor was particular to state that in this later estimate no allowance was made for the enormous amount of water in the bonds.

In the course of his statement Mr. Poor quoted Mr. Charles Francis Adams, writing in 1869 of the capitalization of the Union Pacific Railroad. The statement is all the more interesting in that Mr. Adams later, and at the time of Mr. Poor's statement, was president of the road. Mr. Adams said:

The line from Chicago to New York represents now but $60,000 to the mile, as the result of many years of inflation, while the line between Omaha and San Francisco begins life with a cost of $115,000 per mile. It would be safe to say that this road cost considerably less than one-half of this sum. The difference is the price paid for every vicious element of railroad construction and management. Costly construction, entailing future taxation on freight, tens of millions of fictitious capital; a road built on the sale of its bonds and with the aid of subsidies; every element of real outlay recklessly exaggerated and the whole of it some future day to make itself felt as a burden on the trade which it is to create.

Oh, the prophetic wisdom and foresight of that last statement of Charles Francis Adams, shortly to succeed as president of the road! Was he thinking of this year 1919 when a bill would be proposed in the Senate that would crystallize and embalm forever the shocking fraud and corruption as a burden upon the American people?

By exacting earnings from the public on the basis of this fictitious capitalization, Mr. Poor says:

The Union Pacific and the Central Pacific together divided or carried to the credit of profit and loss over $100,000,000 over and above a fair return upon the capital invested in them. The water in the New York Central equaled $48,000,000, or thereabouts. Upon this sum dividends at the rate of 8 per cent were paid for 15 years, the water and the dividends on the same equaling over $100,000,000.

Mr. Thurber, a New York wholesaler, who testified before the Cullom committee, criticized Mr. Poor's estimate of railroad fictitious capital in this language:

I know there are so many instances where that is so very much short of the mark that it is absurd. I think he said the New York Central was about half water. Why, the New York Central had been watered three times prior to 1867-68, and at that time they doubled it. They put forty-seven millions of water into the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad in 1867-68, and they paid 8 per cent dividends on that forty-seven millions until last year (1885). I think last year they paid 6 per cent.

Mr. Thurber submitted as an example of "how excessive capitalization operates as a mortgage upon the industry of the country," a computation of the amount of these dividends, with interest, over the period of 15 years, which aggregated over $100,000,000.

In the statement of Mr. Simon Sterne, who testified before the Cullom committee as the representative of the Board of Trade and Transportation of New York, we obtain some interesting information as to the manner in which these stock issues and some other questionable items find their way into the construction accounts of the railways.

I shall presently show how the whole system of railway accounting has been built up with a view of concealing these transactions and of concealing the earnings of the railways from year to year up to the present time. Sir, I should not care to trespass upon the time of the Senate to present the facts of the false and fraudulent capitalization of the railroads of these earlier years, except that the villainous system still survives.

You may dull your ears to that, you may deaden your consciences to it, you may set your face to go through with this thing no matter what the showing or what the argument, but let me say to you that you will not bury this fraud by your votes to-day. Like Banquo's ghost, it can not be buried. It is an iniquity that will live until the scales of justice are fairly balanced.

The methods of Gould and Fisk and Vanderbilt and Huntington are the methods of Morgan and Rockefeller and Hill and Harriman and their successors. It is the same old game. The stakes are bigger now. The system of accounts and the other details are much more adroit and clever.

As an example, Mr. Sterne cites the expenditure one year by the Erie of $700,000 as a corruption fund and for legal expenses, which was carried to the "India-rubber account" and charged to the cost of construction. After the capital of the New York Central was doubled in 1869 they had a stock account, "which," says Mr. Sterne, "was out of all harmony with their construction account, and for 10 years following, every year varying, from 3 to 8 per cent of this water was artificially carried into the construction account and the capital account balanced. * * * In the same way the balances were forced in the Erie Railway Co. when Mr. Gould took $40,000,000 of stock of the Erie Railway Co. out of its books and sold it on the street and appropriated the money to his own use, and there was not a dollar's worth of construction to represent it, and when reorganization took place the balance of the Erie Railway Co. was forced to meet that violence done to the stock account."

Is it to be supposed that the people of this country will consent to be taxed to the end of time upon capitalization of that sort?

In the final report of the Industrial Commission is cited the purchase of the Chicago & Alton Railway in 1899. The road had been capitalized at $30,000,000. The purchasing syndicate issued in the purchase a total capitalization of $94,000,000.

Another case cited is that of the St. Paul and Manitoba Co. (Great Northern Co., lessor). The property of this company had previously been bought at foreclosure at $3,600,000, and some years later the recapitalization reached $84,550,000. In the Great Northern rate case of the Minnesota commission the Minnesota court made an appraisal of this property to determine the reasonableness of rates, and held that the cost of reproduction of all property of the company at that time, 1896, could not exceed $44,000,000.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in its decision in the Danville case, said of the $120,000,000 of common stock of the Southern Railway:

> This common stock was issued as a part of a reorganization scheme, under which the Southern Railway Co. came into existence. It does not appear that the persons to whom this stock was originally issued ever paid one dollar in actual value for it. It simply appears that the stock is outstanding.

In like manner the capital of the Atlantic Coast Line was increased $50,000,000 without any additional investment, merely to enable Mr. Morgan to get the control of the Louisville & Nashville from Mr. Gates, whom he considered not a "proper person" to control the destinies of that road.

Mr. James J. Hill testified in an investigation of the Northern Securities merger by the Interstate Commerce Commission that in the purchase of $108,000,000 of Burlington stock by the Great Northern and Northern Pacific companies, $216,000,000 new 4 per cent bonds were issued, and that the purchasing companies which guaranteed the interest on these bonds intended to make the property earn not only enough to pay 4 per cent on this doubled capitalization, but a dividend on the old stock as well. Mr. Hill further testified that in the merger there were issued on the capital of the Northern Pacific $22,500,000, and on that of the Great Northern $39,500,000, or a total of $62,000,000 of securities in excess of the old capital.

In the recapitalization of the Rock Island, $75,000,000 Rock Island stock was converted into $75,000,000 of bonds and $137,000,000 new stock.

William D. Marks, a consulting engineer and statistician, of Philadelphia, Pa., submitted a letter on costs of construction and overcapitalization which figured prominently in the debates of the Fifty-ninth Congress. This letter was published on page 7483 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and stands to-day as a damning commentary upon the methods employed by men in control of the railroads to exploit the public.

After making most liberal allowances for equipment and architectural work and adding to the average standard costs of construction, the engineer arrived at an average cost per mile of $25,200, which, he said, "I have no doubt substantially exceeds the true costs of railways." On the same mileage the roads of the State are capitalized at $52,000 per mile—"51½ per cent water, probably more."

The writer gives as his conclusion, after 34 years of experience and investigation, "that, outside of Massachusetts * * * the equipment rarely costs as must as $5,000 per mile, and we are liberal in putting the cash cost of construction and equipment of all roads at an average of $20,000 per mile," making about $5,600,000,000 for the investment in all the roads of the country in 1903 and leaving the seven billion additional capital to represent water. Every example of extraordinary cost of construction that may be cited is more than offset by hundreds of miles of railway which have been built at a cost much less than $17,500 per mile.

To quote directly from the language of Engineer Marks on the cost of construction:

> You may, and probably will, have many instances of extraordinary cost of construction brought to prove to you the higher cost of our railways. Many of these instances are both unwise and unnecessary expenditures.
> Do you forget that for every such case there are hundreds of miles of railway which honestly have not cost $17,500 per mile to construct and equip; on the contrary, very much less?

The most comprehensive statement of the fictitious capitalization of the American railroads and the most extensive investigation of this question of "water" are probably embodied in the work of Mr. Van Oss, of London, entitled "American Railroads as Investments," published in 1893. While the information here presented is for the benefit of investors primarily, the facts are equally valuable for our purposes. The conclusions are all the more reliable in consideration of the fact that they are offered largely in commendation of our railway securities as investments and are not open to such criticism or radicalism as are usually made by railway interests in answer to statements of this kind. I wish to say that Mr. Van Oss is an investment banker of London. He is late editor of the Investor's Chronicle. He published in 1892 American Railroads as Investments; in 1893, American Railways and British Investors; in 1896, A Decade of Finance. He has written, and still writes, articles for various leading reviews on the subject of finance and investments. The added fact that Mr. Van Oss's work is used extensively in the final report of the Industrial Commission gives it a certain authoritative standing and warrants the extended consideration which I wish to give certain statements and conclusions and the adoption of its final results as the basis for computing an estimate of the actual investment represented by present railway capital.

Mr. Van Oss classifies the different ways of inflating capital of American railways as follows:

1. By fraudulent issues of bonds and shares as a downright swindle or for speculative purposes.
2. By paying too much for construction.
3. By purchasing property at excessive prices.
4. By buying superfluous competing lines.
5. By selling bonds and shares at a discount.
6. By declaring stock dividends.

As an example of stock issued for speculative purposes, the history of the Erie Railroad is cited. The capital of this road was increased between 1868 and 1872 "from $17,000,000 to $78,000,000 mainly to manipulate Wall Street." And President Watson "a few years later doubled the funded debt, it is said, also chiefly for his own benefit."

As an illustration of the construction company frauds, the incident of the South Pennsylvania Railroad is given. This road was started by Vanderbilt to compete with the Pennsylvania, and it was, says Mr. Van Oss—> proven to have cost actually $6,500,000, and a responsible contractor offered to build it at that price. Yet a construction company composed of Vanderbilt's clerks received $15,000,000 to complete it, and the syndicate of capitalists which supplied this money got $40,000,000 in bonds and shares, so that for every dollar of actual cost over $6 of bonds and shares were issued.

> In the same manner, though not in the same proportion, the thing was worked all over the Union. * * * The builders of the Central Pacific, for instance, commenced with the modest sum of $159,000, and, taking this as a nucleus, they completed the road, gathering a capitalization of $139,000,000. * * * The Government Commission on Pacific Railroads in its report to Congress says that $58,000,000 would have been a very good price for the railway.

Of the extent to which was carried the practice of selling to railway companies property of officers and directors at excessive prices in stocks and bonds Mr. Van Oss says:

> Until 12 or 15 years ago the majority of purchases of auxiliary concerns used to be permeated with fraud.

Parallel lines of railway were built to force their purchase at excessive prices, as a sort of blackmail, backed by the threat of competition. Such purchases added great amounts to the capitalization but little or nothing to the earning power of the properties. Thus Vanderbilt was forced to lease the West Shore and buy the Nickel Plate, and the Pennsylvania, in turn, had to come to Vanderbilt's terms to preserve its monopoly from competition of the Southern Pennsylvania.

To secure capital, it was a common practice to allow liberal discounts on bonds, "and shares were frequently given into the bargain. * * * The railroads would have outgrown the payments of excessive rates for money if their affairs had otherwise been conducted with honesty and integrity." But they were not. Hence, "shares not being much sought after, it mattered little to the promoter whether he gave shares into the bargain or not." The majority of companies realized nothing for the shares they issued in their early days. The Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co., for instance, gave the payment made in bonds. The New York Central, Erie, Reading, St. Paul, Chicago & North Western—in short, almost every railway company—received nothing for the earlier issue of its ordinary shares. * * * Instances are given of fictitious capital resulting from the payment of stock dividends, as follows:

In December, 1868, the New York Central distributed a stock dividend of 80 per cent, and 11 months later, when consolidation with the Hudson River Railroad followed, a further stock dividend of 27 per cent was declared, while the Hudson River shareholders received one of 85 per cent.

The Reading paid a scrip dividend of 10 per cent in 1846, one of 12 per cent in 1847, while between 1871 and 1876, upon a capital of $32,200,000, more than half water, $15,700,000 was paid in dividends, mostly scrip.

The Erie made still larger payments of stock dividends; the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy in 1888 paid 20 per cent, and the Santa Fe in 1881 paid 50 per cent.

"The practice," declares Mr. Van Oss, "may be said to have been general and is still resorted to in numerous cases."

The aggregate amount of water in the $500,000,000 capitalization of the Central, Erie, and Reading companies is variously estimated from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000.

Poor's Manual for 1884 points out that the increase of capitalization of American railways for the three years ending December 30, 1883, was $2,093,000,000, or $70,000 per each mile of new road. Mr. Poor said:

The cost of mileage construction certainly did not exceed $30,000 per mile. The whole increase of the share capital and a portion of the funded debt was in excess of the cost of construction.

Referring to this statement of Mr. Poor, Mr. Van Oss says:

Some writers even go so far as to allege that the estimate of Mr. Poor, whom they deem a spokesman of the railways, is moderate and conservative, and the fictitious capital is said by some, among others by Mr. Hudson, to amount perhaps to fully two-thirds of the total capitalization.

Some sound reasons are given by Mr. Van Oss why this view is not improbable.

As a result of his investigation of American railway history and capitalization Mr. Van Oss arrives at two important conclusions: First, that the average amount originally received in actual value for American railway bonds probably did not exceed 67 per cent. Second, that the original investor in American railway stocks certainly paid not more on the average than 10 per cent of their face value, and probably less.

If an estimate on the actual investment in American railroads is computed on the basis of these final percentages given by Mr. Van Oss, on the capitalization as reported by the United States Railroad Administration for December 31, 1918, we get the following result:

Stock, 10 per cent of $7,201,254,960	$720,125,496
Bonds, 67 per cent of $9,241,028,525	6,160,685,682

By this computation, American railroads, with a total capitalization of $16,442,283,485, represent an actual investment of approximately $6,880,811,178. The remaining $9,500,000,000 is largely fictitious capitalization.

I have in my hand, Mr. President, extracts from reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission since 1906, beginning with 1907. I told you that in 1906 an act was passed known as the Hepburn-Dolliver bill, by the terms of section 20 of which the Interstate Commerce Commission was given authority to supervise the accounts of the railroads. What I have been talking of prior to this time is the wickedness and the corruption that exists in those accounts from the beginning of history down to 1906. You can not build a solid structure on a rotten foundation. You can not tell by book values that have iniquity from the beginning of railroad history down to 1906 into those accounts. You can not build up an accounting system with that sort of foundation. I do not care what supervision you had after 1906 under the Interstate Commerce Commission, you have got this rotten thing as a basis of the account, and it is continued and carried along, transferred, kept up, repeated year after year.

But, Mr. President, I hold in my hand extracts from the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission year by year from 1907—the first year after we passed the Hepburn-Dolliver bill—in which they say that they have not been able to correct this iniquity; that it still exists; that even as to the accounts since that time they have not had accountants enough so that they could maintain an adequate supervision. They bear out all I say and more. I shall not take time to read them. To Senators who are present here this afternoon let me say, in a word, they show in themselves that book investment, even from the period of 1907, inclusive, down to 1919, can not be depended upon as accurate and just between the people and the railroads, for the reason, they say, that they have not had force enough to check up the fraud which appears in these accounts as they go over them.

The railroads are still engaged in the same wicked, fraudulent business, and anybody who argues on this floor that railroad corruption and selfishness are things of the past is mistaken; that is all. I will not put it any stronger than that—they are just mistaken.

The Supreme Court, in deciding a case recently, referred, as I said a little while ago, to one of the ablest presidents of railroads in the United States as having committed perjury. Supervision of railroad accounts is just as good as lynx-eyed authority can make it and no better—not a bit. You catch them on the things that you catch them on, and if you have not supervision to catch them on everything the rest of it goes through; that is all; and that is what these printed statements will show.

One year after the passage of the Hepburn-Dolliver Act the Interstate Commerce Commission, in its report for 1907—page 141—took notice of the fact that "the twentieth section of the act to regulate commerce opens to this commission a means for the exercise of some degree of supervision over the manner in which carriers comply with the duties imposed upon them by law."

In the same paragraph of the report appears the following significant sentence, presaging the futile efforts of the commission, commenced in 1907, and continuing up to the hour the Government took control, to force the railroads to render honest accounts:

The law clearly specifies certain acts as illegal, but there is no direct or certain method of preventing such illegal acts.

The commission's report for the same year—1907—on pages 149 and 150, declares that a sound basis for supervising the railroad investment accounts can only be furnished by a "comprehensive, systematic, and authoritative valuation of railway property," and such a valuation in 1919 has been completed in the case of only four or five of the smaller roads of the country. The report of 1907 says, under the head of "Valuation of railway property," pages 149 and 150:

The commission can not emphasize too strongly the significance of the supervisory work which, upon the authority conferred by the twelfth section of the act to regulate commerce as amended, has assumed such large proportions; and believing, as it does, that a comprehensive, systematic, and authoritative valuation of railway property is essential for the successful development of this work, as well as for other purposes named, it does not hesitate to submit to Congress a formal recommendation for the enactment of a law under which such a valuation can be made.

In its report for 1908—the second year after the passage of the Hepburn-Dolliver Act—the Interstate Commerce Commission spoke of the "present unsatisfactory condition of railway balance sheets."

The scathing paragraph in which this report impeaches the accounts of the railroads, even after the law required that they should be kept under the watchful eye of the commission, should be a sufficient answer to Senators who would have the American people believe that the juggling of railroad accounts ceased with the passage of the act of 1906. On pages 84 and 85, the committee report for 1908 reads:

The balance sheet is, perhaps, the most important of the statements that may be drawn from the accounts of corporations, for, if correctly drawn, it contains not only a classified statement of corporate assets and corporate liabilities but it provides in the balance—that is to say the "profit and loss"—a quick and trustworthy measure of the success that has attended the operation and management of the property. Every balance sheet begins with "cost of property," against which is set a figure which purports to stand for the investment. This is no place to enter upon an extended criticism of the practice of American railways in the matter of their property accounts, nor is such a criticism necessary for the purpose in hand. It is sufficient to refer to the well-known fact that no court, or commission, or accountant, or financial writer would for a moment consider that the present balance-sheet statement purporting to give the "cost of property" suggests, even in a remote degree, a reliable measure either of money invested or of present value. Thus, at the first touch of critical analysis the balance sheets published by American railways are found to be inadequate. They are incapable of rendering the service which may rightly be demanded of them. One cure seems possible for such a situation, and one only, and that is for the Government to make an authoritative "valuation of railway property, and to provide that the amounts so determined should be entered upon the books of the carriers as the accepted measure of capital assets. Under no other conditions can the commission complete in a satisfactory manner the formulation of a standard system of accounts."

Two years later, in its report for 1910, the Interstate Commerce Commission again spoke (p. 37) of the "present unsatisfactory condition of railway balance sheets" and declared that the "experience of the commission during the past year serves only to emphasize" the need of "adequate provision for the valuation of railway property."

In its report for 1911 the commission again urged that Congress require a physical valuation of the roads (p. 94):

The experiences of the commission during the past year in its efforts to enforce and administer the law serve only to confirm the views expressed in our last as well as in previous reports in support of our recommendations for the valuation of railway property. This recommendation we respectfully renew.

Describing what it found in its supervision of railway accounts, the commission reported in 1912 (p. 37–38):

The work of general examination of the accounts of steam railway companies has been continued during the past year. These examinations have included several of the larger railway companies, as well as a number of the smaller companies, in different sections of the country. * * * The necessity of such supervision was recognized previous to the establishment of the present examining force, but its value has become more apparent through the results of examinations made. * * * The general examinations * * * made have developed the fact that in some cases items entered in the property accounts have not represented simply expenditures in cash, but have been greatly in excess of such expenditure, whereby the wide disparity between the cost of property and the par value of securities issued has been concealed. Nor should it be assumed that misleading practices in accounting are confined to the statement of capital accounts. Instances have been found of the misstatement of revenue and expense accounts to such extent that the apparent results of operation were materially affected, an actual deficit or surplus being reported as the opposite. Such misstatements are not evident to the reader of the reports, and can only be detected through an investigation in the carriers' office. A number of cases of the more flagrant violations of the accounting rules are now before the commission, and proper disciplinary measures will be adopted in due course.

In 1913 Congress finally voted for a valuation of the railroads, in response to the appeals from the commission which had gone unheeded for years.

That this work is still in an uncompleted form, and that Congress at the present time can have no sound basis for returning the roads to their owners under legislation which can be more than guesswork is obvious from the commission's reports for 1918 and 1919.

In commenting upon delays in the valuation of the roads, the commission reported in 1918 (p. 56):

Our last report stated that the office work of the engineering section should be finished during the year 1920, but in view of the experience of the current year that statement must be somewhat modified. The effect of the war upon the office forces has been more serious than in the field. For some reason it has been more difficult to maintain the integrity of that force, it having several times happened that more than 25 per cent of the office employees in a given district have changed during a single month.

The report continues:

Attention is again called to the fact that, owing to the failure of carriers to furnish necessary information as to their equipment, and especially as to their lands, it is found necessary to stop work upon particular properties and proceed with other properties. To-day the work of the bureau in all branches is well advanced upon every considerable road in the country and is approaching completion upon many of the most important, but reports have been delayed by the lack of this information. Carriers did not realize at the outset the difficulties involved in compiling the original cost of their lands and unreasonably delayed the beginning of that work.

* * * To free the carriers' accounts of inaccuracies and to prevent manipulation of the accounts or questionable practices in connection therewith on the part of those responsible for the accounts and reports, it is essential to maintain field forces for the purpose of inspecting the books, records, and memoranda of the carriers and in a measure policing their accounts and reports. The larger part of the staff of examiners of the bureau of carriers' accounts is ordinarily engaged upon work of this character. The number of examiners is limited, however, and the offices that can be visited and examinations that can be made during the course of the year is necessarily restricted.

If additional proof is needed that the railroads since 1907 have been guilty of the same fraudulent practices which obtained on an even larger scale prior to that date, it is to be found in the current report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for 1919.

On page 37 of this report the commission describes the work of the "Bureau of Carriers' Accounts," which, under act of March 21, 1918, was directed to review the accounts of the carriers for the three-year period ending June 30, 1917. The object of this investigation, the report points out, was to provide Congress with a "basis for compensation of railroad owners for the use of their property during Federal control."

This investigation, the commission reports, resulted in "the discovery and correction of erroneous practices in connection with the important accounts involved, as well as material changes in the amounts reported by the carriers as their operating incomes, which was the immediate object of inquiry."

How can Senators ignore the ugly facts revealed by this report? Upon the highest authority it is here asserted that as late as 1915, 1916, and 1917, up until the very moment when the Government took the roads from the hands of the private owners, railway accounts were being juggled through the "erroneous practices" of railway officials. This is the answer of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the unfounded assertion made on this floor that since the Hepburn-Dolliver Act of 1906 railway investment accounts have been purged of the fraud which all admit existed before 1907. These reports show that, in spite of careful supervision by the commission, the investment accounts are still shot through with dishonest and fictitious returns, and that in guaranteeing a profit to the roads—as this bill proposes to do—and in accepting these accounts as a basis for calculating that profit, we are building upon a rotten foundation.

The current report of the commission for 1919 also plainly shows that the physical valuation of the railroads has been delayed, and makes it obvious that the manifest duty of the Government is to retain control of the roads until, with the completion of the valuation, we shall have something on which to base legislation providing an intelligent solution of the railroad problem.

The following excerpts are taken from the report of 1919 (p. 51):

Fifty-three tentative valuations have been served upon carriers and other interested parties, and hearings are now being held upon protests which have been filed. In connection with the properties of the Texas Midland Railroad, the Winston-Salem Southbound Railroad Co., and the Kansas City Southern System, action upon protests has been taken and final reports published, except that we have not fixed a single sum as the final value of the common-carrier property of any of these carriers.

As stated in our last annual report, the work of the bureau had been seriously interfered with during the war by inability to obtain and retain competent men, and it was expected that with the cessation of hostilities this condition would disappear, but it has not. The difficulty of finding men with the requisite expert qualification has not lessened, and the cost of employing them has materially increased. This has to an extent interfered with progress.

* * * * * * * *

The greatest difficulty is being experienced in the accounting section, and here again the delay rises from the inability of the carriers to furnish us proper information, especially as to the cost of the equipment and the original cost of their lands. * * *

We are finding it extremely difficult to procure the requisite number of accountants who are competent to deal with this question.

Mr. President, as the time approaches to vote on the Cummins bill it is apparent that so far as a practical solution of the railroad problem is concerned Senators are divided upon one fundamental issue. The friends of the bill take the position that Government operation of the railroads has been given a fair trial; that this trial has ended in failure; and that nothing, therefore, remains but to turn the roads back to private operation. The opponents of the bill take the position that during the past two years, as a result of the war, so many abnormal factors have been interposed that Government operation has not enjoyed a fair trial, and that Congress can not act intelligently on the railroad problem until Government operation has been thoroughly tried out under normal, peace-time conditions.

No one has expressed more tersely the position of the friends of the bill than the distinguished chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], in his address on Tuesday, December 2, 1919. He said:

I feel no hesitation in saying that the trial of the past two years has been the fairest trial to which that form of regulation—could be submitted. I repeat that I believe that the Government has had greater advantage in the last two years than it can ever again have save in time of war for the operation of railroad properties. They have operated under great advantages.

That is, Government operation—

Mr. President, I believe it is fair to say that the Senator from Iowa voices the sentiment of nearly every Senator who has spoken in favor of the bill. But the Senators do not stop with this proposition. After laying down the premise that the Government has been given a fair trial under "great advantages," they contend that Government operation has been a disastrous failure, and so strong is their belief in the truth of this latter contention that they state it as an axiom, unnecessary of proof, and they base their entire argument on this assumption.

I do not concede for one moment this argument of the friends of the bill. On the contrary, I contend that all of the data available as to the actual results of Government operation during the past two years and all of the opinions submitted by men of unquestioned authority who are familiar with this situation show that the proposition assumed by these Senators and made the basis of their argument can not be maintained.

I propose to submit a portion of this data and authority at this time in so far as I am able within the limits of time fixed.

This material taken from official sources shows, first, that Government operation succeeded after private operation had failed in meeting the transportation needs of the Nation at war; second, that the two years' period just ending has offered no fair test of Government operation; and, third, that the known results of Government operation justify the hope and the expectation that an extension of five years of the present plan, or even of two years, will show Government operation vastly preferable to private operation.

It seems to me essential in dealing with this whole subject to go back to the time when the Government first commenced the operation of the roads, in December, 1917, and to inquire into the conditions which then obtained. That private operation broke down after we entered the war, and that it was unable to cope even with our domestic needs is within the scope of the experience of every citizen of the country. Even before we entered the war, in the summer and fall of 1916, according to Director General McAdoo—and I quote his words—conditions had "reached such a point that traffic was almost paralyzed through inability to furnish but a small part of the cars necessary for the transportation of staple articles of commerce."

Appearing before the Interstate Commerce Committee on January 3, 1919, Director General McAdoo said of conditions in the fall of 1917:

In the fall of 1917, despite strenuous efforts, and yet under a larger degree of coordination than had ever before been attempted to prevent such a situation, a paralysis of the transportation situation again occurred.

It is unnecessary to submit further evidence along this line. The only dissenting authority from this view, the railroad officials, now banded together in an attempt to induce Congress to turn the roads back to the private operation which brought them to ruin in the critical hour of the Nation's peril.

Mr. President, when Senators assume that Government operation has been a failure they ignore the fact that Government operation succeeded at exactly the point where private operation had failed. When the United States entered the war in April, 1917, it will be remembered that we engaged to supply the armies of France, Italy, and Great Britain with a specified number of tons of grain. In December, 1917, after we had been in the war eight months, we had fallen so far behind in our agreement—because of transportation difficulties—that the prime ministers of the allied countries joined in a communication to President Wilson, calling his attention to the critical condition of the food supply among the armies in the field. In this communication, necessarily kept secret at the time, Lloyd-George, Clemenceau, and Orlando informed President Wilson that the Italian armies, because of our failure to supply the stipulated amount of grain, had been forced to make two reductions in their rations; that the French had made one reduction, and that a revolt among the troops was imminent unless something was done to relieve the situation. This communication suggested to the United States Government a reorganization of the railroad system—mark you, that was under private operation—the prime ministers of the Allies evidently being aware that the American railroads under private operation had broken down.

How the United States met the crisis presented by the communication to President Wilson and how in less than six weeks the railroads under Government operation succeeded in the task at which the railroads under private operation had failed was graphically recited by Director General McAdoo at a hearing before the Interstate Commerce Committee January 8, 1919:

The food situation in the allied countries of Europe became extremely critical in February last (1918), representations being made by Great Britain, France, and Italy that unless the program of food deliveries promised by the Food Administration was kept pace with, Germany and her associates inevitably would win the war. While the facts could not be told at the time because of the possible effect on the morale of the nations fighting the Central Powers, it was nevertheless true that according to official word received from the Entente Allies the outcome of the war depended upon the ability of the American railways to transport sufficient supplies of foodstuffs to the Atlantic seaboard for shipment abroad. This problem was met. It was no time for halfway measures. The safety of the world hung in the balance. Empty box cars were rushed from all portions of the East and South to the Southwestern grain States. Conflicting traffic of all kinds was held up. Every facility of the Railroad Administration and of the railroads under its jurisdiction was thrown into the balance. Officials and employees worked day and night. The result was magnificent. By March 15 the vessel capacity of the Allies had been satisfied, and there was available at North Atlantic ports an excess on wheels of 6,318 carloads of foodstuffs, exclusive of grain on cars and in elevators.

Since that time there has never been any danger of the American railways failing to transport the necessary amount of food supplies for Europe. It, perhaps, is not too much to say that this was one of the turning points of the war.

In the period from July to November, 1918, 135,000 more cars of grain were handled than in the same months of 1917, thus demonstrating the enormous extra strain placed upon the railroads by this one item alone.

Mr. President, how are we to reconcile this statement—from the man who knows more about Government operation of the railroads during the war than any other American—with the bland assumption by the friends of this bill that Government operation has been a failure?

Unless Mr. McAdoo's formal statement before this committee was a fabrication from start to finish, unless he exaggerated the disorganization of the railroads at the time the Government was forced to assume control, unless he tells a garbled story of the successful efforts of the Government to answer the demands of our allies, then we must admit that Government operation succeeded where private operation failed. We must admit more than that. We must admit, as our allies have frequently assured us, that Government operation of the American railways, both in this country and in France, was such a considerable factor in the winning of the war that if transportation had been left in private hands, to quote Mr. McAdoo, "Germany and her associates inevitably would" have "won the war."

But, say the friends of this bill, what of the deficit in 1918, the deficit accruing after the Government had paid a rental to the roads which the author of this bill admits was $200,000,000 in excess of an equitable figure?

Mr. McAdoo gave the obviously sound answer to this objection to Government operation when he told the Senate committee January 3, 1919:

The $136,000,000 of deficit in 1918 is the price America paid for an effective transportation system for war purposes. It is my honest judgment that we did not get as much value for any money we spent in the war as we did for that $136,000,000.

Before leaving Mr. McAdoo's statement to the Senate committee, I wish to submit a few short excerpts contrasting strangely with the claim of the friends of this bill on both sides of the Chamber, who assume that Government operation has already been given a fair trial and has failed. Mr. McAdoo told the committee January 3, 1919:

I feel * * * that what has been accomplished, even under war conditions, is of such infinite value to the public that we ought to carry the experiment still further in order to realize still more the benefits that will come from this unified operation. Certainly none of us should be afraid of a fair and intelligent test. The American people are, it seems to me, entitled to that, and it also seems to me that none of us should fear knowledge. The more knowledge we get the greater progress we can make toward a solution of the difficulty. The net earning power of the railroads will have a vital bearing on some of the plans for a permanent solution of the problem, and the true earning power of the railroads can not be ascertained unless there is a reasonable test under peace conditions. (P. 46, Hearings.)

Again, Mr. McAdoo said:

I believe that even under the handicaps of war conditons a sufficient showing has been made to indicate that all the reforms I have mentioned are desirable as permanent peace measures. Yet it is clear that the general public has not had an opportunity to appreciate this and to weigh the real value of what has been accomplished. There has not yet been an opportunity to give the public knowledge of the facts. In view of the far-reaching importance of any solution of the railroad question which may be adopted, the public is entitled to have, before the present Federal control shall be terminated, a reasonably fair test under peace conditions of the advantages derived from these reforms.

These were some of the considerations which led Mr. McAdoo to recommend to the committee that "Federal control be extended until January 1, 1924."

III. THE FACTS AS TO GOVERNMENT OPERATION SHOWN BY FIGURES.

Mr. President, proceeding upon the broad assumption that Government operation has been a failure, from the standpoint of efficiency and revenue, Senators favoring the early return of the roads to private operation have made statements during this debate which are not supported by the facts.

One of these is the charge that the Government has so misused the physical property of the railroads and has allowed it to deteriorate to such an extent that the railroad owners may for the next 25 years successfully bring claims for compensation and damages against the Government.

Figures compiled from the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Railroad Administration remove all color of truth from this charge.

I am about to submit figures as to maintenance of equipment of Class I roads, covering the period from 1911 to 1918. These figures show that during the year from December 31, 1917, when the Government took over the roads, until December 31, 1918, the Government spent $1,094,825,873 for maintenance of equipment, or more than $400,000,000 in excess of the highest sum ever applied to this purpose during a single year in the history of private operation.

These figures show that in the year 1918 the Government spent 100 per cent more for maintenance of equipment than was spent for the same purpose in 1915 when the roads were under private operation.

Maintenance of equipment—Class I roads.

1911	$415,590,400
1912	436,995,458
1913	499,988,331
1914	520,200,274
1915	496,739,561
1916	557,664,332
1916 (year ended Dec. 31)	595,566,336
1917 (year ended Dec. 31)	685,428,913

What is true of the careful preservation by the Government of the equipment is likewise true as to the generous appropriations for maintenance of way and structures.

The following table shows that in 1918, during the first year of Government operation, the Government on Class I roads spent $644,606,618 for maintenance of way and structures, or $202,000,000 more than was spent for the same purpose in 1917, when the roads were under private operation. This marked an increased appropriation of 50 per cent for this purpose. Now, it must be borne in mind, in considering all these figures, that the money was spent on the recommendation and under the direction of the very railroad officials who are now asking that the roads be returned to private operation, so that it can not be argued that the money was wastefully spent without condemning the men into whose hands the roads will be surrendered if they are returned to private operation:

Maintenance of way and structures—Class I roads.

1911	$348,004,080
1912	348,470,704
1913	406,042,529

1918 (year ending Dec. 31)	23

The following tables show that on the Class I roads, during 1915, 1916, and 1917, under private operation, in spite of increased traffic, the railroads had been unable to augment the number of available passenger cars in order to meet the demands made upon them. The same tables show that in 1918, under Government operation, a substantial number of cars was added, and that a much heavier traffic was in 1918 successfully handled under Government operation than under private operation during the preceding years.

The following comparisons shed further light upon the condition of the roads at the time they were taken over by the Government in the midst of war: From July 1, 1915, to December 31, 1917, freight traffic increased approximately 50 per cent; from July 1, 1915, to December 31, 1917, passenger traffic increased approximately 25 per cent.

Despite this abnormal increase in traffic, which meant an increased burden upon every mile of line, the railroads, under private operation, increased the number of steam locomotives less than 1 per cent and the number of passenger cars approximately 1 per cent.

Director General McAdoo touched upon this phase of the railroad situation, at the time the roads passed from private to public operation, when he said before the Senate committee, January 3, 1919:

> One of the prime causes for the necessity of Government control of railroads and one of the most serious conditions the Railroad Administration was called on to correct when assuming control was the generally bad condition of locomotives and cars.

Mr. President, I return now to the contention of the friends of this bill that Government operation has had a fair trial, under favorable conditions, during the two years of war-time operation. I dissent absolutely from this contention, and particularly from the view of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, who on December 2, 1919, declared:

> I feel no hesitation in saying that the trial of the past two years in the United States has been the fairest trial to which that form of regulation could be submitted.

I have already referred to the deteriorated condition in which the Government found the physical property of the railroads in December, 1917.

To a greater extent than most businesses, successful railroading is dependent upon labor conditions. Can it be said that labor conditions have been favorable during the two years of Government operation? The loss of thousands of skilled workmen who volunteered and were drafted into the service; the drawing of railroad men from this country for the construction and operation of the network of railroads maintained in France; and the loss to the railroads of thousands of men who left their old jobs for the high wages paid in other lines of industry were factors which brought the man power of the railroads to low ebb. The labor "turnover" on the roads was enormous, and the hiring of unskilled employees undoubtedly caused the loss of many millions of dollars.

We were at war. Without effective railroad transportation, overwhelming disaster was inevitable. Speed and output must be regarded as of first importance. The Railroad Administration, therefore, was forced to increase the working hours and to pay time and a half for overtime in extra labor costs. In the locomotive shops the average increase in hours amounted to 16 per cent, an increase made necessary partially because of the bad condition of locomotives and cars at the time they came from the hands of the private owners.

Climatic conditions are a vital factor in the railroad business. No sooner had the Government undertaken the operation of the roads than the country began to experience one of the most severe winters in its history. The severity of the weather continued well into March. In his report for 1918, Director General McAdoo described the effect of the weather upon transportation conditions at this period:

> Roundhouses built 20 or more years ago for locomotives in service at that time were still being used to house locomotives more than twice the size for which they were designed. Repairs had to be made either out of doors or in the open roundhouse with the temperature below zero.

In his report Mr. McAdoo cites the investigation of the Interstate Commerce Commission at Philadelphia on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, which showed that 133 locomotives froze up during the period from December 28, 1917, to January 5, 1918. This condition, according to the report, was common on northern roads.

Carl R. Gray, former director of operations of the Railroad Administration, in the Railway Age, June 6, 1919, wrote:

> We had at Hampton Roads for nearly three months frozen coal in the cars, where they never had a frozen car of coal in all the history of that part of the country.

Another factor which was an insurmountable obstacle to successful private operation of the railroads and which made it necessary for the Government to assume control was the priority of war requirements. Troops and supplies obviously had to be moved before civilian business could be undertaken. This condition made it impossible to obtain a fair test of Federal operation from a business standpoint. From January 1, 1916, to November 10, 1918, 6,496,150 troops were moved over American railways. During 1919 Director General McAdoo estimated that the demobilization of the troops would show the movement of 7,250,000 men. This gigantic burden naturally interfered with the ordinary flow of business and caused the withdrawal of trains devoted to the convenience of the public during ordinary times.

The paramount importance of supplying food to the Allies, by shipment from the southwestern grain States to the Atlantic seaboard, already cited, is only another evidence of the manifest absurdity of the claim that Federal operation during the war had a fair test as to its possibilities from the standpoint of efficiency and revenue.

The Railroad Administration, formed overnight to take charge of the most important industry of the country, labored under many handicaps within its own organization.

The administration was recruited from the managing forces of the private railroad corporations. These men had a natural bias toward private operation. When the President announced in May, 1919, that he intended to turn the railroads back January 1, 1920, officers and employees, uncertain of their future status, suffered a decline of morale. Moreover, railroad officials in executive positions were confronted with a constant temptation to direct policy with an eye to the future private operation of the roads. Under these conditions Government operation could not be said to have had a fair trial.

Senators who favor the pending bill answer every argument in support of Government operation with a hue and cry about the deficit of the last two years.

The conditions already referred to should be a sufficient reply to this argument. But there were yet other reasons why the deficit occurred.

The major part of the deficit piled up after the signing of the armistice. During the months from January to June, 1919, the losses were great. Why? Principally, because business was getting back to a peace basis. Capitalists hesitated to continue projects which had flourished during the abnormal war period. Munition plants shut down. Construction ceased. Commissioner Wooley summed up the situation—speech at Philadelphia, October 18, 1919—when he said:

When you consider that the products of the mines, chiefly coal and ores and road-building material, constitute 70 per cent of all the freight traffic of the railroads, it is easy to understand that the Savior of man Himself, with the Archangel Gabriel as His chief assistant, could not have earned the standard return without increasing freight rates and consequently making higher and higher the cost of living, unless He had performed a miracle.

And it must be remembered that the Government did not increase freight rates, and hence saved the public from the further increase in the cost of living, which such a policy would have caused during the war.

Since July 1, 1919, the railroads have constantly gained ground under Government operation. In the last four months, notwithstanding the strikes in the steel and mining industry, substantial surpluses have been realized. The Government has "turned the corner" in spite of the handicaps against which it has labored.

The chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce [Mr. CUMMINS] made a striking admission which must be considered in relation to the deficit.

Speaking in the Senate, December 4, 1919, he declared:

Those of you who heard me discuss the Federal control bill heard me say that I thought the compensation which that bill provided for was something like $200,000,000 more than it ought to be. I am of the same opinion still. I have seen nothing to disturb my judgment in that regard. (Cong. Rec., p. 137, Dec. 4, 1919.)

What does the Senator's statement mean?

It means that an overcharge of $200,000,000 has been made against the Government in 1918 and in 1919, a total of $400,000,000. If this tremendous handicap had been removed Government operation, in addition to redeeming the failure of the private owners to serve the war needs of the Nation, would have wiped out almost the entire deficit.

Mr. President, I have dwelt at length on the history of Government operation because I believe the Senate ought to consider facts and figures available from disinterested governmental sources as well as the propaganda disseminated by selfish private interests.

No effort has been spared to establish in the minds of the people the impression that Government operation has failed; that it is costing millions of dollars to maintain it; and that nothing short of an immediate return of the roads will save the transportation system of the United States from complete ruin.

Not one of these contentions has any basis in fact. The deficits incurred, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] points out, have been due in large part to the exorbitant rentals paid to the owners by the Government. Further than that, the deficits have been negligible when compared with the cost to the American people of the increased freight rates which the private owners are now demanding in time of peace and which they surely would have required while the country was at war if the Government had not taken the roads from their inefficient hands in order to prosecute the war.

But even if every claim of the railroad owners were well founded I could not support the present bill. If we are to accept in toto the claims of governmental inefficiency and failure, we shall still find no justification for returning the roads with a guaranty of private profit upon billions of fictitious and fraudulent capitalization. I shall cast my vote against saddling that gigantic burden upon the American people.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 3, 1920.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury with reference to the Speedway Hospital. I refer to the former Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. CARTER GLASS:

The letter is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, January 31, 1920.

MY DEAR MR. BYRNES: What may be the purpose of all the controversy on the floor of the House concerning the so-called Speedway Hospital project at Chicago I am sure I do not exactly know; but if there is anything that the Congress has not decided, but may wish to determine, in connection with the matter, I venture to suggest that action should be taken in the light of actual facts and not upon the misinformation which crops up at every point of the discussion as it is chronicled in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

You may be sure that I am in no degree disturbed over the apparent attempt to have it appear that the Secretary of the Treasury is indifferent about hospital facilities for the men who went to war for their country. Among the combatant troops in France, as you know, were two of my own sons, and now in one of the hospitals is one of my nephews, desperately gassed, and decorated for extraordinary bravery. In the circumstances any intimation that I could be careless of the welfare of American soldiers is a part of the humor or knavery of politics, as one may prefer to view it. I do not take it seriously.

The story of the Treasury's relation to the Speedway Hospital scheme is so simple and unmistakable that there can be no excuse for misrepresentation.

In April, 1919, as I was about leaving Washington for the Victory loan campaign, there came to the Secretary's desk the draft of a proposed contract for the acquirement of the Speedway Hospital at Chicago under an act of Congress passed March 3, 1919. Attached to the papers was a memorandum from the Supervising Architect's office saying, "If the Government should acquire this property under the proposed contract it will buy an extraordinary amount of trouble." There was also in the papers a notation by Assistant Secretary Moyle, saying the proposed contract presented for my approval had been rejected by the War Department for Army purposes. Immediate inquiry of the Supervising Architect's office as to the meaning of its notation elicited the reply that the contract was so loosely drawn and so many alterations were necessary to adapt the Speedway project, originally designed for war-emergency uses, to the permanent needs and purposes of the Public Health Service it was impossible to even approximate what would be the eventual cost of the enterprise to the Government. Immediate inquiry of the War Department as to why that department had rejected the proposed contract elicited from Mr. Crowell the statement that the proposal reeked with suspicion.

Since the act of Congress clothed the Secretary of the Treasury with the option of acquiring the Speedway Hospital property and adapting it to the needs and purposes of the Public Health Service within an appropriation of $3,000,000, or of spending the $3,000,000 for the erection of a new hospital building on some other site, I directed an immediate investigation of the whole matter, meanwhile reading with painstaking care the five or six hundred pages of testimony before a Senate committee bearing on the subject.

I could discover no tangible evidence of wrong, but, with a view to ascertaining whether the Speedway property could be acquired and adapted to the needs and purposes of the Public Health Service, as required by law, within the limit of $3,000,000, I directed the Surgeon General and his staff to state to the Supervising Architect's office what were the needs of the Public Health Service in the Chicago territory, and directed the Supervising Architect's office immediately to prepare plans and specifications, based on representations thus made by the officials of the Public Health Service. It should be perfectly obvious that these preliminary steps were necessary to determine, first, the requirements of the Public Health Service in the Chicago territory, and, second, to ascertain if the Speedway Hospital property could be adapted to these needs within the limits of the appropriation made by Congress.

After some unavoidable delay, due to an inadequate force of experts and draftsmen, plans and specifications were prepared, based on representations made to the Supervising Architect's office by the officials of the Public Health Service, covering the needs and purposes of that bureau. Partially upon proposals made by the owners of the Speedway property and the original contractors, and partially upon estimates made by the Supervising Architect's office, the Secretary of the Treasury was advised that the Speedway Hospital property could not be acquired and adapted to the needs and purposes of the Public Health Service for less than $5,500,000, which would necessitate an additional appropriation of $2,500,000 by Congress.

The Secretary of the Treasury was told by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service that to acquire the Speedway Hospital property and adapt it to the needs and purposes of the Public Health Service within the limit of $3,000,000 appropriated by Congress would give the Government a hospital plant which would be totally inadequate and an everlasting discredit to the Government. Meanwhile Congress, for reasons of its own, had taken away from the Secretary of the Treasury the option originally given to use the $3,000,000 appropriation for the erection of a modern hospital plant, as suggested by the Public Health Service, on the Marine Hospital site at Chicago, owned by the Government. Upon the definite statement of the Public Health Service as to its reasonable requirements, supplemented by the statement of the Supervising Architect's office as to the minimum cost to the Government of the modern hospital plant urged by the Public Health Service, the law officer of the Treasury Department advised the Secretary that the latter could not acquire and complete the Speedway Hospital project in any manner that would take the cost beyond the limits of the appropriation made by Congress. Thereupon the Secretary of the Treasury reported the facts to Congress and recommended an additional appropriation of $2,500,000 for the acquirement of the Speedway Hospital property and the erection thereon of such a modern hospital plant as the Public Health Service insists is required.

The owners and proposed contractors of the Speedway Hospital project, averse to a reopening of the question, with its consequent uncertainty, opposed the additional appropriation of $2,500,000 as unnecessary, and before the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds insisted, time and again, that the property might be acquired and the project completed for not 1 penny in excess of the $3,000,000 authorized by Congress. The attorney for the owners and contractors also addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury saying they would complete that part of the hospital plant which the Public Health Service pronounced to be inadequate, but which the Speedway owners and contractors assumed was ample, within the $3,000,000 limit.

Congress disagreed with the Public Health Service as to its requirements in the Chicago territory, and agreed with the Speedway owners and contractors as to the desirability of acquiring the property and completing the plant according to certain identical plans and specifications. It directed the Secretary of the Treasury immediately to take over the property and complete the buildings within the limit of $3,000,000 and according to designated plans and specifications. The debate on the subject clearly revealed that Congress did not expect and would refuse to sanction the expenditure of $1 on this project beyond the $3,000,000 already authorized. In the discussion yesterday the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House explicitly said that he would not advocate the signing of a contract that would involve the expenditure of a single dollar in excess of the $3,000,000 limit.

Thus there seems to be no real difference between what Congress directed and what I am anxious to do. There has not been a minute since the passage of the law of December 24, 1919, that the Secretary of the Treasury was not willing to comply literally with its terms by signing a contract to acquire the Speedway property and complete it for $3,000,000. At the very hour yesterday when gentlemen on the floor of the House were insisting that the Secretary of the Treasury was "quibbling" and declining to sign such a contract, the owner of the Speedway property was in my office with Congressman FORDNEY, in whose presence he explicitly declined my offer immediately to sign a contract with him to acquire the property and complete the hospital plant for the sum of $3,000,000 appropriated by Congress, saying it could not be done for that amount.

I here repeat that the owners of the property, the contractors, and their attorney know perfectly well that I have never declined to sign a contract to acquire and complete the Speedway project within the $3,000,000 limit of cost. On the contrary, every one of them knows that I have repeatedly offered to do this, and stand now ready to do it. They also know that they have refused to sign any contract in which there was not embodied a clause which would bind the Government to pay an indefinite sum above the cost limit fixed by Congress. It may be "quibbling," as some gentlemen of the House graciously suggest, but I am not willing, under the pretense of serving American soldiers, to make this gift of Government funds to the owners and proposed contractors of the Speedway Hospital enterprise in contravention of the statute enacted by Congress.

Finally, I note from the discussion it was said that the contract actually submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury contains a clause which would permit the owners and contractors to charge in excess of the lawful limit of cost. Of course, this is not a fact. The clause thus misinterpreted is merely a precautionary provision which has been inserted in Government contracts for 25 years to enable the parties interested to adjust necessary alterations strictly within the total limit of cost. That is all.

Very truly, yours,

CARTER GLASS.

Rivers and Harbors Appropriation Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. ROBSION,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 22, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the bill we are now considering we are advised is the smallest river and harbor appropriation bill that has been reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors since the policy of annual bills was adopted some 10 or 12 years ago. It carries in the aggregate $12,400,000. The small amount carried in this bill has been the subject of a great deal of criticism on the floor of the House by the Democrats. The Democratic administration asked this Congress to give them about $42,000,000 for river and harbor work for the year ending March 1, 1921. The committee having this bill in charge has cut the estimate something like $30,000,000, and for this splendid act of economy and courage on the part of the committee they deserve the thanks of the Congress and the gratitude of the American people.

The several departments under this Democratic administration have submitted estimates to carry on the expenses of the Government this year, and these total $9,000,000,000. The revenues as fixed by the Democratic Congress in March, 1919, will provide only about $6,000,000,000, and the country is therefore facing a deficit for this year of something like $3,000,000,000. In other words, this Democratic administration has requested Congress to appropriate and authorize them to expend $9,000,000,000 when the total revenues that can be collected this year is only about $6,000,000,000.

They would have this Republican Congress to approve their plan to spend $3,000,000,000 more than the income would be this year and to create a debt in the ordinary expenses of the Government three times as great as the total expenses of the Government for any one year prior to the war, and would have this Congress to appropriate nine times as much as it cost to run the Government any one year before the war. Our country is already in debt something like $30,000,000,000. It would be the worst sort of folly to increase the indebtedness $3,000,000,000 more this year, when the country is on a peace basis. We must begin to decrease our tremendous national debt instead of adding to it. This proposal on the part of the Democratic administration is merely a continuation of its policy of waste and extravagance, pursued until a Republican Congress was elected and put a check upon it.

REPUBLICAN ECONOMY.

The Republican Congress, when it passed the regular appropriation bills at the special session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, 1919, saved the American people something like a billion dollars. This is a saving of about $10 in taxes for every man, woman, and child in America. The Republican Congress proposes to cut down all of these Democratic estimates for the various departments and save to the American people more than a billion dollars this year. To expend $9,000,000,000 would mean $90 in taxes for every man, woman, and child in America and $450 for each average American family of five persons. I stated to this House last August that the high taxes, waste, and extravagance of the Democratic administration were largely responsible for the high cost of living. This view is now generally accepted by all who have made a study of the problem. Secretary of the Treasury Glass in recent interviews and reports to Congress has pointed out that the high taxes now being levied and collected are largely responsible for the high prices prevailing throughout the country. Some of our people have the impression that the corporations and rich people pay these tremendous taxes, but no person is so poor or destitute who does not help to pay them. We pay them on our clothing, our shoes, our food, our medicine, our school supplies, our heat, our light, our water, our prayer books, our songbooks, our tobacco, cigars, soft drinks, ice cream, candy, chewing gum, our railroad and water transportation, telephone and telegraph messages, and, in fact, on everything that enters into our life and work. Since this is true, that Member of Congress and that party can best serve our country at this time by observing the strictest economy consistent with the public service. We must always keep in mind that we are not spending our own money, but the money of the American people.

I AM OPPOSED TO NEW LOANS TO ALLIES AND FAVOR THE COLLECTION OF THE INTEREST WHICH OUR ALLIES OWE US.

Our Allies borrowed from us during the war something like $10,000,000,000 and they still owe us this sum. In December, 1919, the interest on this sum, amounting to nearly $500,000,000, came due, but Secretary Glass, of the Treasury Department, did not require our Allies to pay this interest, and agreed with them that they would not be required to pay it until some time in the distant future. Congress can not control this matter, but I desire to register my protest against this action on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The plea is made that our Allies are hard pressed for funds. It is equally true that the American people and American business have almost been bled white with excessive taxes, and if we do not collect this interest from our allies and apply same to the running expenses of our own Government we must go down into the pockets of the American people and get $500,000,000 in taxes. Indirectly we are taxing the American people $500,000,000 to aid these European countries. I am sure the American people do not approve of this action.

President Wilson had the Democratic Congress to appropriate $100,000,000, and which was appropriated and sent to Europe to feed the Bolsheviki, as he explained, to stop Bolshevism. He gave our hundred millions, but Bolshevism increased. This administration now asks Congress to appropriate another $150,000,000 for substantially the same purpose. I am very much opposed to this, and I am sure the Republican Congress will not grant this request. It appears that this Democratic administration wants to be the Santa Claus for the world. It is all right for an individual to be generous with his own funds, but it is another question when it comes to an official taking the money from the overburdened taxpayer of America and giving it to the people of Europe. They must quit fighting over there and go to work.

THRIFT, ECONOMY, AND INDUSTRY.

For the last two or three years this administration, through the press and on the platform, has preached thrift and economy, but in the affairs of the Government they have indulged in the wildest sort of extravagance and waste. The people have been saving by the spoonful, but those in charge of the Government have been throwing it away by the steam shovelful. If we succeed in leading the people to save and economize, the Government must by example as well as by precept save and economize in administering the Government's affairs. If we succeed in placing the affairs and business of this country upon a safe and sane basis, we must all practice the strictest economy, not only in our private affairs but in the business of the Government. Economy and industry for the next few years will solve nearly all of our troubles.

THE NEEDS OF THE RIVERS AND HARBORS ARE WELL PROVIDED FOR IN THIS BILL.

While it is true that this bill carries an appropriation of only $12,400,000 for the maintenance, preservation, improvement, surveys, and so forth, on rivers and harbors, we must bear in mind that this is not all of the money that is available for river and harbor improvement for this year. There are more than $60,000,000 that has heretofore been appropriated for this work but which has not yet been expended, so that if we add this $12,400,000 there will be available for river and harbor maintenance and improvement for this year more than $70,000,000. There has never been spent in one year more than one-third of this sum, so that the claims of our Democratic friends that this small appropriation will cripple or hinder commerce is without foundation in fact. Notwithstanding that there was heretofore appropriated more than $60,000,000 that has not been spent and not more than one-half of this sum could be spent this year, this Democratic administration wanted this Congress to appropriate an additional $42,000,000, and complained because the Rivers and Harbors Committee had cut from this estimate $30,000,000. The Congress has already this year passed two appropriation bills and each of them has been substantially reduced below the estimates submitted. I understand that it is the policy of this Congress to cut, and to cut deep, every estimate submitted by the various departments of the present administration and to reduce the Army and Navy and to save to the American taxpayers more than a billion and a quarter dollars.

CUMBERLAND RIVER BENEFITED.

The river and harbor bill passed by the Sixty-fifth Congress carried a provision whereby no new project for river improvement could be carried on if it should cost under present high-price conditions more than 40 per cent above the original estimates made before the war. Owing to the immense increase in the cost of labor and material, this would cut out any future work on 17 new river projects, and this includes the Cumberland River. In order to relieve this situation this bill repeals that provision, so that work may go forward on the Cumberland and other river projects, and I most heartily indorse this provision in this bill.

There is a general law that provides that no river can secure locks and dams unless the county governments or the citizens living in the county or counties where the locks and dams are to be constructed enter into a written agreement with the Government and guarantee the Government against the payment of any damages to lands that might be overflowed or covered with water by reason of the construction of said locks and dams. This rule applies to all rivers as well as the Cumberland River in Kentucky and Tennessee. The county government of Tennessee has the power under the laws of Tennessee, as a county, to make this guaranty, and the counties of Tennessee through which the Cumberland flows have made this guaranty. Under the laws of the State of Kentucky the county government can not make this guaranty, but this guaranty must be made by individual citizens or corporations, and for that reason the counties of Wayne, Russell, Clinton, Cumberland, and Monroe, bordering on the Cumberland River in Kentucky, have not made these guaranties. The work on the Cumberland in Kentucky will have to be held up until these guaranties are made. I hope that this provision of the law will be repealed at an early date. It is a difficult matter to get the citizens of any county to enter into this guaranty, although it would not amount to very much. Many men feel like they can not afford to enter into a guaranty when they do not know how much it will amount to. I am assured by the authorities that work will be carried forward on the Cumberland when these guaranties are executed.

RIVERS AND ROADS MUST BE IMPROVED.

We have devoted much time toward building up the railroad transportation of the country. It is the finest system in the world, but I feel that we have neglected the great waterways of the country and have permitted the railroads in a large measure to kill water transportation. I have no sympathy with the policy that has wasted millions on insignificant streams of the country, waterways that do not possess the possibilities of profitable development. This is not true of the Cumberland River in Kentucky. It is the only means of transportation for the counties of Monroe, Cumberland, Clinton, Russell, and a large part of Wayne.

I have reliable statistics showing that nearly half of the perishable products of the country is lost by reason of lack of means of transportation. Water and rail transportation should be coordinated. This country needs the full development of both of these, and the Federal Government should aid the States in building great highways in and through every county of the Nation, so that the people of remote rural sections may be in close touch with either water or rail transportation. This will make better farms and better farmers and greatly increase production, make better schools and better citizens. I trust that the Congress will greatly add to the plan of Federal aid to the public highways of the Nation and adopt and pursue a policy whereby all the people will receive benefits from the Federal appropriations, and the American people will receive $1 in value for every dollar spent by them.

The River and Harbor Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDW. D. HAYS,
OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 22, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, my congressional district has a water front of more than 200 miles on the Mississippi River, and my people are vitally interested in the development of inland waterway transportation. Ordinarily I gladly yield to the advice of the various House committees on pending legislation, but in the present case I am compelled to register a protest against the judgment of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, because the bill now standing for consideration is manifestly unfair to the commercial interests of the great Mississippi Valley.

The committee bill proposes a total appropriation for all the river and harbor projects in the whole United States of only $12,000,000; of this sum but seven million is for new work, while five million is assigned to maintenance of past projects. No specific sum is designated for any particular piece of work. It has been pointed out that $27,000,000 remains unexpended from former appropriations, but I ask you to consider the fact that of all this sum only a small portion is available for development purposes on the Mississippi and Missouri rivers. The Missouri River from Kansas City to the Mississippi has to its credit $379,367; the Mississippi River from St. Paul to the Missouri has to its credit $586,875; the Mississippi River from the Missouri to the Ohio has to its credit $367,573. On these three projects combined the certain money available is only $1,333,815; beyond that sum our only chance for drawing a small prize out of the $7,000,000 of construction money in this bill is but a gamble on the arbitrary whim of the Secretary of War. Men who know these rivers gravely doubt whether the total money available after the passage of this bill will maintain navigation in its present unsatisfactory condition, and no one is visionary enough to look for substantial betterment.

In undertaking to justify the meager and wholly inadequate appropriation proposed in this bill the committee chairman and the majority leader have made the plea of economy. Every man who is posted on public affairs knows that the National Treasury is suffering strain on account of having to meet tremendous necessary outlays with relatively limited receipts. Every Member recognizes the imperative obligation of economy. But let us temper our economy with sanity; let us guard against hysterical economy. I want this Congress to avoid the short-sighted policy of being penny-wise and pound-foolish. The true criterion to determine the difference between extravagance and economy is not the mere size of an appropriation. One dollar foolishly squandered is extravagance, whereas a hundred dollars wisely invested is economy.

The prosperity and comfort of our people are measured by the enterprise of their commerce, and the very life blood of commerce is transportation. No better national investment can be made at this time than to develop a comprehensive system of inland waterway transportation. Every dollar of our commerce calls into requisition either railroad or waterway transportation. American business enterprise is being strangled and hampered to-day for want of shipping facilities. The railroad business has not kept pace with other business. Complaint from every quarter proves that the cars can not handle the freight. In many instances the product of the soil or the factory is kept out of market for want of shipping facilities. That means an overabundance of these commodities in one locality with a corresponding shortage elsewhere. When the shortage occurs the price goes upward in harmony with the law of supply and demand. Freight cars are in such demand that the cost of shipping goes up accordingly. These evils reflect themselves in the retail price that the ultimate consumer must pay for the food he eats and the clothing he wears and the lumber he uses to build his home. Every man who has made an extended study of the high cost of living knows that much of the present price inflation is due to our restricted transportation facilities. The best authorities tell us that the railroads are not as well situated to-day for handling freight as they were five years ago; moreover, they tell us that another five years of most favorable development will be required to put the roads back into the effectiveness they enjoyed five years ago. In other words, railroad development is 10 years behind the growth of our commerce. The railroads of the country have not added a mile to the total of their trackage in recent years, and their present scrambled condition holds out no attraction for the investment of new capital. The railroads can not handle the business of the country and will not be able to do it for many years to come.

The surest and speediest relief for the transportation situation is to open our inland waterways to their fullest capacity. That can not be done on the limited appropriation proposed in the pending bill. If you will afford an adequate amount of money to develop our inland rivers, the result will be such freight reduction as to materially cheapen many of the commodities we have to buy. Every dollar spent for improving our river system will be bread cast upon the waters, and it will come back to the pockets of the people in freight saving manyfold greater than the amount of the appropriation. Likewise the converse of the proposition is true. Every dollar needed for river improvement which Congress withholds imposes an added burden on the people by forcing them to pay exorbitant freight rates. It is our duty as Members of Congress not only to conserve the money in the National Treasury, but likewise to conserve the money in the pockets of the people. It must follow that competing river transportation will cheapen railroad transportation not only on lines paralleling the rivers but also on lines far removed from the rivers. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, a river appropriation of reasonable size is not a gift to certain localities, as some gentlemen have intimated, but is a wise investment for the benefit of the public.

One extremely foolish argument in support of this bill was the statement made and repeated, in substance, that the past commerce on our rivers, particularly the Missouri River, would not justify a large appropriation. But nothing can be more illogical than such a charge. The reports of our Army engineers prove conclusively that where money has been properly expended on the Missouri River the channel has been maintained and that river has been kept open to navigation. Yet no man would have the courage to say that at any time has the Missouri River been put in a finished condition from Kansas City to St. Louis. Always there has been a portion of it left undone, and that portion, however small, has been sufficient to defeat navigation.

It is an old maxim that no chain is stronger than its weakest link; likewise, for the purposes of navigation, no river channel is deeper than its shallowest point. If one sand bar impedes the channel anywhere along the route boats can not ply on the river. That has always been the case of the Missouri River, except in seasons of high water. The reason this great stream has not had a larger freightage in past years is because the earlier Congresses have never put it in a position to handle the freight that was ready to be floated.

What I have said with regard to lack of development of the Missouri River applies with equal force, but in less degree, to that stretch of the Mississippi River between St. Louis and Cairo.

In my judgment the Newton bill, H. R. 5030, is much nearer in line with the necessities of the case than the pending committee bill. For the three river streaches from Kansas City to St. Louis, from St. Paul to St. Louis, and from St. Louis to Cairo the Newton bill proposes improvement appropriations aggregating $9,000,000; it also proposes that the Secretary of War may contract for a three-year improvement plan on each of these projects in anticipation of subsequent congressional appropriations in harmony with the recommendations of the Army engineers. I favor the Newton bill because it is based on the practical investigation and intelligent judgment of expert engineers, who have surveyed and studied the situation; on the other hand, the appropritaion in the committee bill is an arbitrary reduction from the estimate of the engineers and not in harmony with the demands of the situation. The Missouri, the Mississippi, and the Ohio Rivers, with their tributaries, constitute the greatest potential inland waterway system in the world, great not only because of the splendid expanse of territory stretching from the Alleghenies to the Rockies and from Canada to the Gulf, but great because no equal area on the globe approaches it in the variety and abundance of its production from farm, forest, mine, and factory.

In all fairness to the commerce of the great central valley of our Nation we should substitute for this bill some scheme in line with the ideas of the engineers who have worked out this great problem and who have made proper recommendations.

A Primer of the Four Income Taxes in the War Revenue Act for Taxes on Incomes Earned in the Year 1919, and Thereafter.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIS C. HAWLEY.

OF OREGON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 28, 1920.

AN ILLUSTRATED INCOME-TAX PRIMER FOR INCOME TAXES PAYABLE FOR THE YEAR 1919 AND THEREAFTER.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is the purpose of these remarks to present plainly in the English of conversation and commerce the income-tax features of the war-revenue act of the Sixty-fifth Congress, chiefly by means of illustrations.

It discusses the income taxes to be paid on incomes for the year 1919 and thereafter.

These taxes are four in number:

Individuals pay—
- First, a normal tax (sec. 210b); and
- Second, a surtax (sec. 211).

Corporations pay—
- First, a normal tax (sec. 230 (2)); and
- Second, an excess-profits tax (secs. 301b, c, d, e, 302, 303, 304, 305, 312).

CHANGES IN THE RATES OF INCOME TAXES FOR THE YEAR 1919 AND THEREAFTER.

On individuals.

The normal taxes on individuals are reduced, as follows:

In 1919, he will pay 4 per cent on the first $4,000, instead of 6 per cent as in 1918; and on the remainder 8 per cent in 1919, instead of 12 per cent as in 1918.

The surtaxes are unchanged.

On corporations.

The taxes on corporations are reduced, as follows:

First. In 1919 a corporation will pay on the first bracket a tax at the rate of 20 per cent, instead of 30 per cent as in 1918; and on the second bracket at the rate of 40 per cent in 1919, instead of 65 per cent in 1918.

Second. The war-profits taxes are eliminated, except in special cases provided for in section 301c.

Third. The corporation tax is reduced from 12 per cent to 10 per cent.

It will be apparent that greater reductions have been made in the taxes on corporations than in those on individuals.

In the computations given below too great detail has not been attempted but the segregations are sufficient to illustrate the application of the principles upon which such taxes are based. Accuracy in the computations and simplicity in their presentation have been the chief aim.

Supposed returns from individuals and corporations have been used as illustrations, and the purpose has been to present illustrations covering typical cases, and to include as nearly as possible all the essential features of each tax without embarrassing the illustrations with multitudes of details.

In the preparation of the statements and charts included in these remarks I have had the expert assistance of Mr. John E. Walker, formerly clerk of the Committee on Ways and Means. I wish to express my sincere appreciation of the valuable assistance he has rendered.

Partnerships (secs. 218a and 224).

Partnerships as such do not pay the normal tax or the surtax. But each member of a partnership will pay both the normal tax and the surtax upon his pro rata share of the taxable income of the partnership, whether the earnings have been distributed or not.

Personal-service corporations (sec. 218e).

Personal-service corporations as such are not taxed under Title II, but the individual stockholders are taxed in the same manner as members of partnerships.

INDIVIDUALS.

Individuals pay two kinds of income taxes, but on net income only:

1. A normal tax (sec. 210b).
2. A surtax (sec. 211).

Net income (sec. 212) is ascertained by computing the gross income (sec. 213) and subtracting therefrom certain deductions (sec. 214) and credits (sec. 216); certain items not deductible are excluded (sec. 215).

Gross income (sec. 213a).

Gross income (sec. 213a) is the total of all gains, profits, and income derived from salaries, wages, or compensations, from professions, vocations, trades, businesses, commerce, sales, or dealings in property, interest, rent, dividends, or securities, or gains from any business transaction, or gains, profits; or income from all sources whatever.

Items not included in gross income (sec. 213b).

The following items are not included in the gross income:

Life insurance paid to beneficiaries or to the estate of the insured.

Refund of premiums paid on life insurance.

Value of property acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, but income derived therefrom is included in gross income.

Interest on securities issued by State, Territory, or municipalities or obligations of the United States, under certain restrictions, but a statement of such holdings must be made in the return.

Accident or health insurance or money received under workingmen's compensation acts.

Soldiers, sailors, and marines pay income taxes only upon that portion of the compensation received during the period of the war from the Government which is in excess of $3,500.

Deductions (sec. 214a).

Deductions (sec. 214a): From the gross income ascertained as above stated there are subtracted the following deductions arising during the year for which the taxes are paid:

Ordinary and necessary expenses incurred in carrying on the trade, profession, or business.

Interest paid or accrued within the taxable year upon indebtedness, except upon indebtedness incurred to purchase tax-free obligations other than obligations of the United States, issued after September 24, 1917.

Taxes paid or accrued, except income, war-profit and excess-profits taxes levied by the United States, and taxes against local benefits.

Losses sustained and charged off during the taxable year, where not compensated for by insurance or otherwise, under certain limitations.

Debts ascertained to be worthless and charged off during the taxable year.

Allowances for amortization in the case of buildings, equipment, or machinery or other facilities constructed, erected, installed, or acquired on or after April 6, 1917, for the production of articles contributing to the prosecution of the war.

Allowances for losses sustained during the taxable year 1919 from falling inventories.

Reasonable allowance for exhaustion, wear and tear.

Depletion in the case of oil or gas wells, or other natural deposits, or timber.

Contributions or gifts for religious, charitable, scientific, and educational purposes not in excess of 15 per cent of the net income.

Items not deductible (sec. 215).

No deduction shall be allowed for personal, living, or family expenses.

For new building or betterments increasing the value of the property.

For restoring property or making good the exhaustion for which allowance is or has been made.

Life insurance premiums in certain cases.

Credits (sec. 216).

Credits: There is further subtracted from the gross income the amount of the following credits in computing net income for normal tax only:

Dividends received from corporations taxed before being distributed.

Interest on obligations of the United States as provided by law and bonds of the War Finance Corporation. See section 213 (4) and section 214 (a) (2).

One thousand dollars for each single person, $2,000 for each head of family or married persons living together, and $200 for each dependent child.

Dividends.

Amounts received by individuals as dividends from corporations which have paid corporation normal tax prior to distribution are not subject to the normal tax, but are subject to the surtax.

CHART I.

Net income (sec. 212).

Net income means the gross income as defined is section 213, less the deductions allowed by section 214.

This illustration is taken from the experience of John S. Brown, a thrifty and versatile merchant, doing business in a town of 20,000 people, interested in local business enterprises, buying and selling city and farm property, and lending money.

Gross income (sec. 213).

His gross income (sec. 213 (a)) consists of the following items:

Profits as a merchant	$60,000
Compensation as president of the local water company	3,000
Compensation as manager of the electric-light company	2,000
Profit on sale of city property	3,000
Profit on sale of farm	10,000
Rents from city property	1,000
Rents from farm property	2,000
Interest on money lent	3,000
Dividends from corporation securities	6,000
Total gross income	90,000

Deductions (sec. 214).

He is allowed the following deductions (sec. 214) from the gross income ascertained above:

Rent paid for store building	$5,000
Pay of employees	10,000
Numerous incidental items necessary for the conduct of the business	2,000
State, county, and local taxes for the year 1918	4,000
Loss from fire, less insurance	2,000
Debts ascertained to be worthless and charged off	2,000
Wear, tear, and depreciation	1,000
Gifts and contributions—Red Cross, $1,000; church, $600; Y. M. C. A., $400; college endowment, $5,000; other contributions, $1,000	8,000
Total deductions	34,000

Credits for normal tax only (sec. 216).

For the purposes of the normal tax only he is allowed the following credits (sec. 216) as a further reduction of the gross income:

Dividends received on corporation on which the tax was paid prior to distribution	$6,000
Interest on securities issued by public authority (none held).
$2,000 as married man living with his wife and $200 each for 5 dependent children	3,000
Total credits allowed	9,000

Certain items of which no account is taken in computing the gross income.

He received during the year the following sums which are not included in his gross income, and of which no account is taken in computing his gross income (sec. 213 (b)):

Life insurance carried by his father	$5,000
From bequest of his father	10,000
Refund of premiums on insurance	100
Interest on public or municipal securities (none held).
From accident and health insurance	1,000

Certain items for which no deduction is allowed.

He is not allowed to deduct these items (sec. 215):

Personal, living, and family expenses	$4,000
Improvements and betterments, adding to the value of the property	10,000
Repairs compensated for under the wear-and-tear allowance	1,000
Premiums on life insurance inuring to his benefit	1,000

THE LAW QUOTED.

The law levying the normal tax upon the net income of an individual is as follows for the incomes earned in the year 1919 and thereafter:

"SEC. 210. That, in lieu of the taxes imposed by subdivision (a) of section 1 of the revenue act of 1916 and by section 1 of the revenue act of 1917, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every individual a normal tax at the following rates:

"(b) For [the year 1919 and for] each calendar year thereafter, 8 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 216: Provided, That in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States the rate upon the first $4,000 of such excess amount shall be 4 per cent."

CHART II.

The normal tax to be paid by John S. Brown.

Normal tax: We are now ready to compute his normal tax:

Gross income		$90,000
Deductions allowed	$34,000
Credits allowed	9,000
Total items to be subtracted		43,000
Net amount subject to the normal tax		47,000
He will pay normal tax on—
$4,000 at the rate of 4 per cent		160
$43,000 at the rate of 8 per cent		3,440
Total normal tax		3,600

The first chart deals with the income taxes paid by individuals. It takes the supposed returns made for and the taxes paid by John S. Brown, a merchant in a town of 20,000 people, doing a general mercantile business, buying and selling real estate, city and country, owning a farm and some city property, and having some money at interest. As the income taxes are levied only on net incomes, it is essential to ascertain what such net income is. Mr. Brown has a gross income under section 213 (a) on his profits as merchant, of $60,000; as president of the local water company, $3,000; as manager of the local electric light company, $2,000; as a profit on a city property that he bought and sold, $3,000; as profit on farm property, $10,000; rent on city property, rent on farm property, interest on loans, dividends from corporation securities, making a total gross income of $90,000.

The deductions allowed under the bill are the rent on the store building, the pay of the employees, incidental expenses, city, county, and local taxes, loss from fire, insurance, debts, wear, tear, and depreciation, gifts, and contributions, making a total of $34,000. The credits provided under section 216 and shown in Chart I apply only to normal taxes on the individual and not on the surtax of individuals; such credits are the dividends from corporations, on which taxes have been paid prior to distribution and which he must report in his gross income, but for which he is given credit in the credits; interest on public securities, of which he held none; and, being a married man, living with his wife, he is entitled to a $2,000 deduction, and, having five children, a further deduction of $200 for each child, making $3,000 in all; the total credit is $9,000.

Having ascertained the factors necessary to determine what tax he will pay, we will compute the normal tax on Mr. Brown, which is paid on net income only. The gross income is $90,000. The deductions are $34,000, the credits are $9,000, making a total of $43,000 to be subtracted from the gross income. Deducting $43,000 from the gross income of $90,000 there remains $47,000 subject to the normal tax. He will pay a tax at the rate of 6 per cent, on the first $4,000 of this, or $240; he will pay on the remainder of $43,000 a tax at the rate of 8 per cent, or $3,440. The total normal tax will be $3,600.

His normal tax for the year 1918 on the same amount of income was $5,400.

CHART III.

Surtax to be paid by John S. Brown.

Surtax: The surtax is computed as follows:

Gross income		$90,000
Deductions	$34,000
Credits (not allowed).
Total of items to be subtracted		34,000
Net amount subject to surtax		56,000

COMPUTATION OF TAX.

On amounts between—
$5,000 to $6,000, or $1,000 at 1 per cent	10
$6,000 to $8,000, or $2,000 at 2 per cent	40
$8,000 to $10,000, or $2,000 at 3 per cent	60
$10,000 to $12,000, or $2,000 at 4 per cent	80
$12,000 to $14,000, or $2,000 at 5 per cent	100
$14,000 to $16,000, or $2,000 at 6 per cent	120
$16,000 to $18,000, or $2,000 at 7 per cent	140
$18,000 to $20,000, or $2,000 at 8 per cent	160
$20,000 to $22,000, or $2,000 at 9 per cent	180
$22,000 to $24,000, or $2,000 at 10 per cent	200
$24,000 to $26,000, or $2,000 at 11 per cent	220
$26,000 to $28,000, or $2,000 at 12 per cent	240

$36,000 to $38,000, or $2,000 at 17 per cent	340
$38,000 to $40,000, or $2,000 at 18 per cent	360
$40,000 to $42,000, or $2,000 at 19 per cent	380
$42,000 to $44,000, or $2,000 at 20 per cent	400
$44,000 to $46,000, or $2,000 at 21 per cent	420
$46,000 to $48,000, or $2,000 at 22 per cent	440
$48,000 to $50,000, or $2,000 at 23 per cent	460
$50,000 to $52,000, or $2,000 at 24 per cent	480
$52,000 to $54,000, or $2,000 at 25 per cent	500
$54,000 to $56,000, or $2,000 at 26 per cent	520
Total surtax	7,010

The surtax is computed on the same amounts that the normal tax is computed upon, except that he is not allowed to deduct the credits provided in section 216. His gross income is $90,000; his total deduction is $34,000. This leaves an amount of $56,000 upon which the surtax is to be calculated. The surtax begins at $5,000. He will really pay surtax on $51,000 only.

CHART IV.

Total tax to be paid by John S. Brown.

His total tax will be—

Normal tax	$3,600
Surtax	7,010
Total of taxes	10,610

He paid a total tax of $12,410 for the same amount of income earned in 1918.

CORPORATIONS.

Corporations pay two kinds of taxes. They pay on their net income only—

1. A normal tax (sec. 230(2)), and
2. An excess-profits tax (secs. 301 b, or 301 b and c).

Gross income (sec. 233).

For the purpose of the normal tax, gross income is ascertained in the same manner as that for individuals (sec. 213), with the modifications provided in section 233 for three special cases.

From the gross income so ascertained there is then subtracted the deductions allowed in sections 234, 235, 236, and 238.

The Treasury sheets will contain all the items in detail and with minuteness. It would complicate this explanation and require a large number of pages even to enumerate all the possible items that are deductible arising out of the various trades, businesses, and occupations. Only the general statements are submitted here.

The items in the report of each corporation will depend upon its own business facts, but each computation will follow the lines in general of the illustrations given below.

For the purposes of these taxes the important factor is to ascertain the net income for the taxable year of 1919, and around the various methods for arriving thereat, for determining the average profits for the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, known as the prewar period, and the definition of invested capital the battle of conflicting opinions rages.

Deductions (sec. 234).

Deductions (sec. 234): The following deductions from the gross income are authorized which arise during the year for which the tax is to be paid:

All ordinary, usual, and necessary expenses paid or incurred in carrying on the business, trade, or occupation.

Interest paid and accrued within the taxable year on indebtedness, except that incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations or securities, other than obligations of the United States, issued after September 24, 1917, exempt from taxation under this title.

Taxes (except indebtedness incurred to purchase tax-free obligations other than bonds of the United States issued after Sept. 24, 1917) paid or accrued, except income, war-profits, or excess-profits taxes, or taxes assessed against local benefits; but the war-profits or excess-profits tax paid by a corporation is deducted from its net income before computing its normal tax.

Losses sustained and charged off and not covered by insurance or otherwise.

Debts ascertained to be worthless and charged off.

Dividends from other corporations which have paid tax thereon.

Allowances for exhaustion, wear and tear of property used in the trade or business.

Allowances for amortization in the case of machinery, buildings, equipment, or other facilities constructed, installed, or acquired on or after April 6, 1917, for the production of articles contributing to the prosecution of the war.

Depletion allowance for oil or gas wells or other natural deposits and timber.

Additions required by law to reserve funds in case of insurance companies, death losses, and annuity payments.

There are other provisions for insurance companies.

Allowances for losses sustained during the taxable year 1919 from falling inventories.

Credits (sec. 236).

Credits (sec. 236): The following credits are also allowed to be deducted from the gross income arising in the year for which the tax is to be paid:

Income from securities issued by public authority and included in the gross income under section 233.

War-profits and excess-profits taxes, for normal tax only.

Special exemption of $3,000 for war-profits and excess-profits tax.

Special exemption of $2,000 for normal corporation tax.
Certain credits for taxes paid to other countries. (Sec. 238.)

THE EXCESS PROFITS TAX LAW QUOTED.

"Part II.—Imposition of tax.

"SEC. 301. (a) That in lieu of the tax imposed by Title II of the revenue act of 1917, but in addition to the other taxes imposed by this act—

"(b) For the taxable year 1919 and each taxable year thereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the net income of every corporation (except corporations taxable under subdivision (c) of this section) a tax equal to the sum of the following:

"FIRST BRACKET.

"Twenty per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the excess-profits credit (determined under section 312) and not in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital.

"SECOND BRACKET.

"Forty per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital.

"(c) For the taxable year 1919 and each taxable year thereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the net income of every corporation which derives in such year a net income of more than $10,000 from any Government contract or contracts made between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, both dates inclusive, a tax equal to the sum of the following:

"(1) Such a portion of a tax computed at the rates specified in subdivision (a) as the part of the net income attributable to such Government contract or contracts bears to the entire net income. In computing such tax the excess-profits credit and the war-profits credit applicable to the taxable year shall be used.

"(2) Such a portion of a tax computed at the rates specified in subdivision (b) as the part of the net income not attributable to such Government contract or contracts bears to the entire net income.

"For the purpose of determining the part of the net income attributable to such Government contract or contracts, the proper apportionment and allocation of the deductions with respect to gross income derived from such Government contract or contracts and from other sources, respectively, shall be determined under rules and regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

"(d) In any case where the full amount of the excess-profit credit is not allowed under the first bracket of subdivision (a) or (b), by reason of the fact that such credit is in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital, the part not so allowed shall be deducted from the amount in the second bracket.

"(e) For the purpose of the act approved March 21, 1918, entitled 'An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes,' the tax imposed by this title shall be treated as levied by an act in amendment of Title II of the revenue act of 1917.

"SEC. 302. That the tax imposed by subdivision (a) of section 301 shall in no case be more than 30 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of $3,000 and not in excess of $20,000, plus 80 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of $20,000; the tax imposed by subdivision (b) of section 301 shall in no case be more than 20 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of $3,000 and not in excess of $20,000, plus 40 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of $20,000; and the above limitations shall apply to the taxes computed under subdivisions (a) and (b) of section 301, respectively, when used in subdivision (c) of that section. Nothing in this section shall be construed in such manner as to increase the tax imposed by section 301.

"SEC. 303. That if part of the net income of a corporation is derived (1) from a trade or business (or a branch of a trade or business) in which the employment of capital is necessary, and (2) a part (constituting not less than 30 per cent of its total net income) is derived from a separate trade or business (or a distinctly separate branch of the trade or business) which if constituting the sole trade or business would bring it within the class of 'personal service corporations,' then (under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary) the tax upon the first part of such net income shall be separately computed (allowing in such computation only the same proportionate part of the credits authorized in sections 311 and 312), and the tax upon the second part shall be the same percentage thereof as the tax so computed upon the first part is of such first part: Provided, That the tax upon such second part shall in no case be less than 20 per cent thereof, unless the tax upon the entire net income, if computed without benefit of this section, would constitute less than 20 per cent of such entire net income, in which event the tax shall be determined upon the entire net income, without reference to this section, as other taxes are determined under this title. The total tax computed under this section shall be subject to the limitations provided in section 302.

"SEC. 304. (a) That the corporations enumerated in section 231 shall, to the extent that they are exempt from income tax under Title II, be exempt from taxation under this title.

"(b) Any corporation whose net income for the taxable year is less than $3,000 shall be exempt from taxation under this title.

"(c) In the case of any corporation engaged in the mining of gold, the portion of the net income derived from the mining of gold shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this title, and the tax on the remaining portion of the net income shall be the proportion of a tax computed without the benefit of this subdivision which such remaining portion of the net income bears to the entire net income.

"SEC. 305. That if a tax is computed under this title for a period of less than 12 months, the specific exemption of $3,000, wherever referred to in this title, shall be reduced to an amount which is the same proportion of $3,000 as the number of months in the period is of 12 months.

"SEC. 312. That the excess-profits credit shall consist of a specific exemption of $3,000 plus an amount equal to 8 per cent of the invested capital for the taxable year.

"A foreign corporation shall not be entitled to the specific exemption of $3,000."

Items not deductible (sec. 235).

The same items as for individuals under section 215.

Method of computing the excess-profits tax (sec. 301b).

It will be necessary to compute this tax before computing the corporation tax, as the amount paid in such tax is deducted from the net income before computing the corporation tax.

The excess-profits tax is computed for each corporation. (Secs. 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 310, 311, and 312.)

Excess profits means the profits in excess of a net return of 8 per cent on the invested capital for the taxable year. In addition there is a special exemption of $3,000.

If the corporation earned less than $3,000 during the taxable year, it is exempt from this tax. There are also other cases enumerated in section 304 in which exemptions may occur.

The excess-profits tax for the taxable year 1919 is computed in the first and second brackets of section 301b with the deductions provided in section 312.

FIRST BRACKET.

First bracket: The rate of tax in this bracket is 20 per cent of the amount found to be taxable in it. If the net income for 1919 is 20 per cent or more than 20 per cent of the invested capital, the taxable amount is ascertained by finding 20 per cent of the invested capital and subtracting therefrom 8 per cent of the invested capital and also the special deduction of $3,000. (See Charts V, VI, VII, and others.)

If, however, the net income is less than 20 per cent of the invested capital, then the taxable amount is found by subtracting from the actual income in dollars 8 per cent of the invested capital and the special exemption of $3,000. (See Chart XVII.)

SECOND BRACKET.

Second bracket: No tax will be levied in this bracket unless the net income exceeds 20 per cent of the invested capital. If the net income does exceed 20 per cent of the invested capital, then the amount taxable in this bracket is found by subtracting from the actual net income 20 per cent of the invested capital. (See Charts V, VI, VII, and others.) The rate of the tax is 40 per cent on the amount found to be taxable in this bracket.

CHART V.

Explanation of method of computing the excess-profits tax.

Original invested capital	$250,000
Capital added in 1919	50,000
Total capital in 1919	300,000
Net income for 1919	150,000

It is necessary to ascertain the above items in order to compute the taxes on corporations under section 301b and c.

Excess-profits taxes (secs. 301b and 312).

First bracket, section 301 (b):
20 per cent of $300,000		$60,000
Deductions, section 312—
8 per cent of $300,000	$24,000
Special exemption	3,000
Total deductions		27,000
Amount taxable in first bracket		33,000
Tax in first bracket is 20 per cent of $33,000		$6,600

I have taken the case of a corporation whose original capital was $250,000, invested in the business prior to the year 1919. In 1919 it found it necessary to add the sum of $50,000 to its capital, making its total capital $300,000 for the year. Its net income for the year 1919 is $150,000. The excess-profits tax is computed under sections 301b and 312, and is computed before the normal or corporation tax is computed.

In the first bracket the deductions are 8 per cent of the invested capital for the year, plus a specific exemption of $3,000, and the difference between the sum of these and 20 per cent on the invested capital is the amount to be taxed in the first bracket. In the case now being considered, 20 per cent of the invested capital is $60,000. Subtracting from that 8 per cent of the invested capital, or $24,000, plus $3,000 specific exemption, or $27,000, there is left $33,000 to be taxed in the first bracket. This is taxed at the rate of 20 per cent, and 20 per cent of $33,000 is $6,600, which is the tax in the first bracket.

Second bracket, section 301b:
Net income	$150,000
20 per cent of $300,000	60,000
Amount taxable in second bracket	90,000
Tax in second bracket is 40 per cent of $90,000		$36,000
Total of taxes in first and second brackets		42,600

From the net income of $150,000 there is subtracted 20 per cent of the capital. This 20 per cent is the 20 per cent already taxed in the first bracket. Twenty per cent of the invested capital is $60,000. Subtracting that from $150,000 leaves $90,000 to be taxed in the second bracket. The rate of tax in the second bracket is 40 per cent, and 40 per cent of $90,000 is $36,000. Adding the tax in the first bracket to the tax in the second bracket, we find the total tax of the first and second brackets, or the excess-profits tax, to be $42,600.

LAW IMPOSING CORPORATION TAX QUOTED.

"TAX ON CORPORATIONS.

"SEC. 230. (a) That in lieu of the taxes imposed by section 10 of the revenue act of 1916, as amended by the revenue act of 1917, and by section 4 of the revenue act of 1917, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation a tax at the following rates:

"(1) For the calendar year 1918, 12 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 236; and

"(2) For each calendar year thereafter, 10 per cent of such excess amount.

"(b) For the purposes of the act approved March 21, 1918, entitled 'An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes,' five-sixths of the tax imposed by paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) and four-fifths of the tax imposed by paragraph (2) of subdivision (a) shall be treated as levied by an act in amendment of Title I of the revenue act of 1917."

Explanation of method of computing the corporation tax under sections 230 (2) and 236.

The normal corporation tax is computed at the rate of 10 per cent on the difference between the net income for 1919 and the excess-profits tax and a $2,000 special exemption. That is, from the net income subtract the excess-profits tax and $2,000 and take 10 per cent of the remainder. See any chart.

Net income	$150,000
Deductions, sec. 236:
Taxes under section 301a	$42,600
Specific exemption	2,000
Total deductions	44,600
Net taxable amount	105,400
10 per cent of $105,400, or the normal tax, is		$10,540
Total of all taxes to be paid by this corporation		53,140

Having ascertained what the corporation must pay under section 301b, we now compute the corporation tax as provided in sections 230 (2) and 236.

It is computed as follows: The net income of $150,000 is taken and from that is deducted, under section 236, the amount of taxes paid under section 301b, $42,600—and then a special exemption of $2,000—making a total deduction of $44,600, which, taken from $150,000, leaves the net taxable amount $105,400. The corporation tax is 10 per cent of this $105,400, or $10,540.

Add $10,540 to the amount ascertained in the two brackets of $44,600, making a total tax that this corporation will pay on this statement of facts of $53,140.

The total tax paid by this corporation is as follows:

Tax in first bracket	$6,600
Tax in second bracket	36,000
Normal tax	10,540
Total	53,140

This corporation paid on the same net income in 1918 a total tax of $82,528.

CHART VI.

A corporation paying in both brackets, affording an opportunity for detailed explanations.

Invested capital for 1919		$100,000
Net income for 1919		35,000
First bracket, excess profits (sec. 301b).
20 per cent of $100,000	$20,000
Deductions (sec. 312):
8 per cent of $100,000	$8,000
Specific exemption	3,000
Total deductions	11,000
Amount taxable	9,000
20 per cent of $9,000, or tax in first bracket		1,800

The term "excess profits" means net profits on the invested capital in excess of 8 per cent thereon. This corporation made 35 per cent net profit on its invested capital in 1919. In the first bracket a tax is levied at the rate of 20 per cent on that portion of the net profit which equals a return of 20 per cent on the invested capital. Twenty per cent on $100,000 is $20,000. But before levying the tax certain deductions are allowed. Every corporation is exempt from taxation on an earning equal to 8 per cent on its invested capital, which in this case is $8,000, and also in addition thereto a specific exemption of $3,000, making in this instance a total deduction of $11,000. A deduction of $11,000 from $20,000 leaves $9,000 to be taxed in this bracket, at the rate of 20 per cent, producing a tax of $1,800.

Second bracket, excess profits.

Net income for 1919	$35,000
Deductions (20 per cent of $100,000)	20,000
Amount taxable	15,000
40 per cent of $15,000, or tax in second bracket		$6,000
Total tax in first and second brackets		7,800

In the second bracket the remainder of the net income for 1919 is taxed. The amount is ascertained by subtracting from the entire net income the amount taxed in the first bracket. The net income of $35,000, less $20,000, dealt with in the first bracket, leaves $15,000 to be taxed at 40 per cent, producing a tax of $6,000.

The total excess-profits tax based upon net profits is $1,800 in the first bracket and $6,000 in the second bracket, or $7,800 in all.

Corporation tax (sec. 230 (2)).

Net income for 1919	$35,000
Deductions, section 236:
Excess-profits tax	$7,800
Specific exemption	2,000
Total deductions	9,800
Amount subject to normal tax	25,200
10 per cent of $25,200, or normal tax		$2,520

From the net income for 1919, or $35,000, deduct the taxes paid in the first and second brackets, or $7,800 plus also the specific exemption of $2,000, and there is a remainder of $25,200, upon which the corporation tax of 10 per cent is paid, producing a tax of $2,520.

In the charts that are a part of these remarks I have endeavored to select illustrations that will cover the entire field as near as may be possible. They vary from corporations having small capital to corporations with very large investments, and from earnings of a small amount to earnings of very large amounts. They are arranged in the order of the amount of invested capital.

SECOND BRACKET.
Net income for 1919	25,000,000
Deductions: Since that part of the net income equal to 20 per cent of the invested capital is taxed in the first bracket, that amount is now deducted from the net income to ascertain the amount to be taxed in the second bracket, 20 per cent on invested capital	15,000,000

Total of excess-profits tax		5,799,400
Corporation tax (sec. 230a (2)).
Net income for 1919	$25,000,000
Deductions:
Excess-profits taxes	$5,799,400
Specific exemption	2,000
Total deductions	5,801,400
Amount subject to corporation tax	19,198,600
10 per cent of $19,198,600, or corporation tax		1,919,860
Total of all taxes to be paid by this corporation in 1919		7,719,260

Attention is called to section 302, which states: "The tax imposed by subdivision b of section 301 shall in no case be more than 20 per cent of the amount of net income in excess of $3,000, and not in excess of $20,000 plus 40 per cent of the amount of net income in excess of $20,000." It is apparent that this limitation will apply only when the corporation is earning several hundred per cent on its invested capital. I give below a chart which illustrates the application of this portion of the law:

CHART XXVII.

A corporation paying under the limitation of the amount on the excess-profits tax.

Invested capital for 1919		$30,000
Net income for 1919		120,000
Rate of net income 400 per cent.
Excess-profits tax (sec. 301b).
FIRST BRACKET.
20 per cent on invested capital of $30,000	$6,000
Deductions, sec. 312:
8 per cent on $30,000	$2,400
Specific exemption	3,000
Total deductions	5,400
Amount taxable in first bracket	600
20 per cent of $600, or tax in first bracket		120
SECOND BRACKET.
Net income for 1919	120,000
Deduction: Since that part of the net income equal to 20 per cent of the invested capital is taxed in the first bracket, that amount is now deducted from the net income to ascertain the amount to be taxed in the second bracket, 20 per cent on invested capital	6,000
Amount taxable in second bracket	114,000
40 per cent of $114,000, or tax in second bracket		45,600
Total of excess-profits tax		45,720

Section 302 provides that the total excess-profits tax shall not exceed 20 per cent of that part of the net income represented by the difference between $3,000 and $20,000, or $17,000, plus 40 per cent of the remainder of the net income, which in this case is $100,000.

Computing the tax according to this provision, we have:

20 per cent of $17,000	$3,400
40 per cent of $100,000	40,000
Total	43,400

Since this amount is less than the amount of the excess-profits tax computed in the ordinary manner, we use this amount of $43,400 as the excess-profits tax in computing the corporation tax:

Corporation tax (sec. 230a (2)).

Net income for 1919		$120,000
Deductions:
Excess-profits taxes	$43,400
Specific exemption	2,000
Total deductions	45,400
Amount subject to corporation tax	74,600
10 per cent of $74,600, or corporation tax		$7,460
Total of all taxes to be paid by this corporation in 1919		50,860

CHART XXVIII.

Illustrating the method of computing the excess-profits taxes when the net income of a corporation is derived in part from Government contracts and in part from private contracts.

Section 301, subdivision c, reads as follows:

"(c) For the taxable year 1919 and each taxable year thereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the net income of every corporation which derives in such year a net income of more than $10,000 from any Government contract or contracts made between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, both dates inclusive, a tax equal to the sum of the following:

"(1) Such a portion of a tax computed at the rates specified in subdivision (a) as the part of the net income attributable to such Government contract or contracts bears to the entire net income. In computing such tax the excess-profits credit and the war-profits credit applicable to the taxable year shall be used.

"(2) Such a portion of a tax computed at the rates specified in subdivision (b) as the part of the net income not attributable to such Government contract or contracts bears to the entire net income.

"For the purpose of determining the part of the net income attributable to such Government contract or contracts, the proper apportionment and allocation of the deductions with respect to gross income derived from such Government contract or contracts and from other sources, respectively, shall be determined under rules and regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary."

The law above quoted provides that the portion of the net income obtained from Government contracts shall be taxed under the provisions of the law for the year 1918, but that the portion earned from private contracts shall be taxed under the law for 1919.

Under regulation No. 45, articles 716 and 719, the excess-profits tax to be paid by a corporation under section 301c is found by computing the tax under section 301a and section 301b. The tax is apportioned between the net income from Government contracts and the net income from private contracts in the proportion that the net income from each bears to the total net income. If three-fourths of the net income is derived from Government contracts, then three-fourths of the tax as computed under section 301a is taken, and one-fourth of the tax computed under section 301b; or, to state it in per cents, if 65 per cent of the net income is derived from private contracts, then 65 per cent of the tax as computed under section 301b is taken and 35 per cent of that computed under section 301a.

The following illustration shows the method of computing the tax where one-half of the net earnings of the corporation were derived from Government contracts and one-half from private contracts:

Method of computing that portion of the tax due to profits on Government contracts.

Invested capital, 1919		$1,000,000

40 per cent of $200,000, or tax in second bracket		80,000

What income taxes would have been paid had the business in Chart V been owned by an individual instead of a corporation.

It is difficult to make a comparison of this kind as the deductions and exemptions for normal and surtaxes for individuals are different from those for corporations for the normal and war-profits and excess-profits tax. But supposing that an individual had an income of $150,000 upon which he pays both normal and surtax.

A corporation paid in 1918, $82,528, and in 1919, $53,140 as income taxes on the net income as given above.

The provisions of the income-tax law for 1919 reduce the taxes to be paid by corporations to a greater extent than they do for individuals or partnerships.

"America First."

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. HICKS,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 3, 1920.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit the following address by my colleague, Mr. CROWTHER:

ADDRESS DELIVERED BEFORE THE AMERICAN LEGION AT FORT PLAIN, N. Y., JANUARY 8, 1920, BY REPRESENTATIVE FRANK CROWTHER, OF NEW YORK.

"Americanization is an all-American job, and every live-wire citizen, man or woman, is eligible for a place on the 'America First' team.

"During the last half century particularly we have been blithering and prattling about our wonderful melting pot, and we suddenly discover on removal of the lid that the contents have not melted. There has been a great deal of sentimental gush disseminated, largely by political tricksters to further their own selfish ends, but until very recently there has been no organized effort to bring about real Americanization. We felt secure in the fact that the public schools of this great Nation would serve as a cure-all for what is now heralded as Bolshevism. Magnificently have our educational institutions measured up to the demands made upon them and the percentage of graduates who were children of foreign parentage, their remarkably high rating and success in the business and professional world, is, indeed, a tribute to the public school system of America.

THE WEEDS OF ANARCHY.

"But this feeling of security has received a severe jolt during the past few years and especially during the last few months. We are confronted with facts and figures that cause us to regretfully realize that a tremendous percentage of the active leaders in these various cults which all lead toward anarchy in the final analysis were born and bred in America of American parents. We have been alseep while the weeds of anarchy have grown to such a height that they bid fair to choke the wheat of good citizenship. These weeds grew and flourished in the soil of the muckraking campaigns in sensational magazines and yellow newspapers. Successful men constantly held up to ridicule, their characters assassinated, mean insinuations as to how they made their money, until a certain element looked frowningly upon every man who had seemingly an unjust proportion of this world's goods. Corporations and so-called 'trusts' have been hounded and pounded, and even the various branches of the Government have been attacked as being oppressive and unjust. And all this in America, where we sang 'The Star-Spangled Banner' and were positive that there was no such country, and no such flag in all the world.

"It became a fad to take up these various cults, and men and women of standing in various communities allied themselves with this rapidly growing army of Philistines. They helped to build a modern Frankenstein that now threatens to trample our American ideals and devastate the best country in the world. There must be many a troubled conscience in this broad land now that they realize what the harvest is to be from the seed that they as Americans sowed. But we are not dismayed. The great majority of the people in these United States are loyal, well balanced, and not easily frightened, and fully realize that unless we eradicate this spirit of anarchy we shall stand discredited before the world. During the war we boasted of our melting pot and its share in producing the finest Army in the world, and results confirmed our judgment. Sons of English, Irish, Scotch, Italian, Slav, Scandinavian, German, Pole, and French all answered the Nation's call when the dial of time registered the hour for America to take her place on the field of battle. Not a man of them that ever wants a hyphen used to describe his nationality; he helped to bury that hyphen with the bones of autocracy at Chateau-Thierry and in the Argonne Forest, where he conveyed the knowledge to the world that he was possessed of what is sometimes delicately referred to as initiative, but when I was a boy in old New England was more forcibly described as 'guts.'

THE AMERICAN LEGION.

"Who has the temerity to suggest that any one of these stalwart Americans will ever ally himself with any organization that has for its objective the destruction of our Government; as well might we expect to see the heavens fall. Every soldier in America will remember as long as he lives that four of his comrades were shot at Centralia, Wash., on Armistice Day; the most dastardly act ever committed in our home land, and if in the coming years we are threatened with destruction by reds from within, as we were lately threatened by the Huns from without, and all efforts at Americanization have failed, then once more every member of the American Legion will demonstrate that in defense of his country, her institutions, and her flag he is never 'too proud to fight.'

"America has been described as an 'international boarding house,' and among the boarders that have come to us are some of the best and some of the very worst element from the European countries. It is almost beyond comprehension that in a land so fraught with opportunity, where royal blood or birth count for nothing, where four-square manhood and sweet, virtuous womanhood are the prerequisites of society's demand; where fortune beckons from the hilltop to climb the paths of capability and efficiency, and find there the laurel from which victory weaves her garlands, that there should be an alien element intent on sowing seeds of anarchy and destruction. Have we neglected to treat them as neighbors, have we stood aloof too long, have we created false lines of social distinction, have we developed an American snobbishness augmented by the power and influence of the almighty dollar, or have we stood afar off, as did the Pharisee, and exclaimed, 'I am holier than thou'?

"Fruitless will be the endeavor to search out our failure unless we are to face the situation boldly and with determined purpose. Various alien groups have segregated themselves and turned a deaf ear and a blind eye to our national ideals, language, and citizenship. They have fostered anarchy, I. W. W'ism, socialism, communism, while we have been chasing dollars by day and jazzing till the wee sma hours of the morning. Now that we are fully awake we find that 2,000,000 of our boys were across the seas making the Stars and Stripes the most welcome sight in Europe; we have been dancing on the edge of a volcano which has lately shown signs of becoming exceedingly active. What is the cure? Surely not the shotgun, not the militia, not State constabulary; only in the direst emergency should such methods prevail, for in this favored land of ours we hope and pray that civil war shall never again raise its bloody hand, neighbor against neighbor. Let us put more fire under the great American melting pot, the fire of enthusiasm and united effort; forbid the printing and distribution of seditious documents in foreign languages; let our immigration laws add to the quality of citizenship rather than the quantity. Let's practice the democracy we have boasted so much about and sacrificed so many glorious young lives in defense of; let's remember that every year there are born many millions of real Americans and that the traditions of America shall serve as inspiration for the generations yet unborn; that Christianity with its multitude of creeds, fraternity with its hosts of exemplars, and humanity with all its blessings still prevail.

AMERICA FIRST! LET'S GO!

"And 'mothers.' Mothers who give boys and girls to the world and train them, watch over them, and pray for them, glorifying in their contribution to the Nation's citizenship, and then fold their hands in sweet content and journey to the undiscovered land. Mothers such as gave us the great American expeditionary forces; 2,000,000 men in France, aye, and 2,000,000 mothers' hearts. Let's try once more—yes; 10,000 times more—to have every self-respecting alien become a citizen; to greet him as friend and neighbor; to make him realize that America is the land of opportunity. Then if all this effort fails and force seems the only expedient veterans of the American Legion, reinforced by the support of every other loyal American, will cry, 'America first; let's go.'"

Helium.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRITZ G. LANHAM,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 3, 1920.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, the following brief statement with reference to the discovery, production, and use of helium was prepared by direction of the Bureau of Mines at my request for information concerning it. The conservation of this noncombustible gas is a matter of great importance, and under leave granted by the House to extend my remarks I am inserting this interesting statement for the information of the Members of Congress:

STATEMENT CONCERNING HELIUM PRODUCTION.

In connection with the recommendation made in report 484, on H. R. 8819, to the effect that the practicability of securing helium at a reasonable price in large quantities be inquired into before further experiments are made at Fort Worth, the following information concerning the development of the helium program in the United States is herewith submitted.

It is desired first, however, to state that the program for helium production was entered into by the Government only after it had been exhaustively considered from every angle and had been approved by engineers of international distinction. Representatives of the British Government conferred with officers of the Army and Navy and with experts of the Bureau of Mines upon the subject, and the advice and cooperation of some of the country's most eminent technical men were secured.

Up to the present time hydrogen has been practically the only gas used for filling balloons. As far as buoyancy is concerned, it is the ideal gas for this purpose, as it is the lightest of known substances. On the other hand, however, hydrogen is extremely inflammable, and before the war had progressed very far it was discovered that airships filled with it were so easily destroyed by incendiary bullets that such craft could be used only where they could be effectively protected from attack by this weapon.

The officers responsible for the air-service activities of the belligerent countries had been continually seeking for some noninflammable substitute for hydrogen, but the various attempts made to utilize noninflammable gases in balloons were unsuccessful on account of their relatively great weight. Then the possibility of obtaining helium in practicable quantities appeared.

Helium is next to hydrogen in buoyancy. Its weight is but twice that of hydrogen, so that in balloons, compared with the far heavier enveloping air, it exerts a lifting power of about 92 per cent of the lighter gas. Since it is also absolutely noninflammable, in it has been discovered the all-round ideal balloon gas so long sought by scientists.

Before the war the price of helium was approximately $1,700 per cubic foot, and only extremely small amounts of it could be obtained even at this figure. After the British entered the war they considered the feasibility of obtaining helium from their mine gases and of separating it from the natural gas issuing from certain wells in Canada. It was not found in the former, and the small helium content and nature of the latter made the separation very difficult.

Helium was first found in natural gas in Kansas in 1907. Very soon after the United States entered the war the Army, Navy, and Bureau of Mines became interested in the project of obtaining it from this source for the use of the lighter-than-air service of the United States. This work was considered of the first importance on account of the great tactical advantage which the allied forces would possess equipped with aircraft so vastly superior to those of the enemy that attack by the latter would prove extremely difficult and hazardous. On July 31, 1917, the first allotment of $100,000 was made from Army and Navy funds for helium production on an experimental scale, this measure being recommended by the Aircraft Board. Various other allotments for this purpose have been made since that time. The total sums involved, which have been spent or are allotted as sufficient to carry on the helium program up to July 1, 1920, are approximately as follows:

Plants Nos. 1 and 2 and laboratory	$641,700.00

The most marked improvement in the methods of obtaining helium has been made since the Government's program was originally started, and the present cost of its separation on an experimental basis is so low that in time of war, aside even from the tactical advantages its use in balloons will afford, money will actually be saved by its large-scale production and substitution for hydrogen, by reason of the greater immunity from fire risk. And it is probably not too much to say that in the not distant future the production cost will be so much further lowered that even in time of peace its use will be indicated both on account of the greatly reduced fire risk just mentioned and the reduction of hazard to human life.

Since the world's supply of helium is apparently limited, however, it is probable that hydrogen will continue to be employed by the Air Service in certain types of balloons, while helium will be used only in other types in which its peculiar characteristics insure decided advantages. It has also been found that hydrogen in certain percentages can be mixed with helium and so used as a balloon gas without risk of inflammability, and helium may be employed as an inclosing safety envelope for hydrogen-filled balloons.

What has been said above relates but to one of what may be many important uses of helium in war and in peace. Up to recently the amount produced was so minute in quantity that helium was not much more than a laboratory curiosity. Therefore its range of properties and the consequent possibilities for its useful application in science and the arts could not be fully determined and developed, and only now is such research work made a reality.

In view of the above considerations, and of the progress already made in the production of this remarkable gas, it would be a disastrous policy on the part of the Government to in any way discourage further developments of the helium program, as this program offers the possibility of ultimately reducing the expense incident to the maintenance of the armed forces of the country, while at the same time, furnishing a weapon of the greatest value.

DEVELOPMENT IN HELIUM PRODUCTION.

As above stated the price paid for helium before the entry of the United States into the war was approximately $1,700 per cubic foot. It is probable that not over 100 cubic feet had been isolated in the world.

After our entry into the war three experimental plants for the production of helium from natural gas obtained from the Petrolia pool, at Petrolia, Tex., were erected. Two of these, known as plants 1 and 2, were located at Fort Worth, the gas being supplied through a pipe line from the former place, and the last plant, known as plant No. 3, was established at Petrolia. Plant No. 1 was erected and operated in cooperation with the Linde Air Products Co., plant No. 2 with the Air Reduction Co., both of New York.

During the operation of these plants approximately 225,000 cubic feet of helium was separated from the natural gas, this helium being contained in mixtures varying from 60 per cent to 92 per cent purity. While helium of 92 per cent purity is suitable for use in balloons, that of lower purity must first be brought up to approximately this percentage before it can be so employed.

The cost of producing 1 cubic foot of helium in a mixture of 92 per cent purity in plant No. 1, the most successful plant to date, was about 39 cents. This shows an extremely remarkable reduction in the price of producing helium, especially when the fact that this was an experimental plant and was not of such proportions as to give lowest cost is taken into consideration.

After helium of 92 per cent purity was produced in experimental plant No. 1, the Navy, acting for the Army and Navy, entered into a contract with the Linde Co. for the erection of a large production plant at Fort Worth. This is now practically completed, and it is expected that it will be in operation in the near future. Plants 1 and 2, having served their experimental purpose, have now passed out of existence.

The cost of producing helium in the new production plant, as estimated by the Navy Department, which is in charge of its construction and operation, is 5.22 cents per cubic foot. This indicates that this plant will produce helium at about one-seventh of the cost of production in the experimental plant. This figure is so low that in time of war the Government will save money by using a maximum of helium as a balloon gas, as the reduced loss of balloons will more than offset the increased cost of the gas over hydrogen. This statement is based on estimates prepared in France by the Air Service during the World War.

Plant No. 3, located at Petrolia, Tex., is still in the stages of experimental development. It is, however, of such a size that, if the experiment is successful, the plant can be used without further change for the commercial production of helium. In this plant an attempt is being made to develop an entirely new process of gas separation, and those in charge of its operation have reason to believe that it will bring the cost of producing helium down to a very low minimum.

The cost of hydrogen used by the Air Service during the World War was, on the average, 1 cent per cubic foot. While hydrogen can, under favorable conditions, be produced at prices considerably less than this, the figure of 1 cent per cubic foot gives the actual cost of the hydrogen used during the war as obtained under war conditions.

In view of the fact that the cost of helium has been very remarkably reduced in the last two and a half years, and, further, in view of the fact that its probable cost as produced in the gas plant at Fort Worth will be so low that, everything considered, it will be cheaper for the Government to fill balloons with helium rather than with hydrogen; again, since helium provides the United States with a weapon of warfare which, so far as is known, is not available to any other nation, because nearly all of the practicable supplies of helium so far discovered are contained within the borders of the United States, and on account of the anticipated further considerable reduction in the cost of helium below the present figure, it seems that it is extremely inadvisable to take any action at the present time which would in any way delay or interfere with the proper carrying out of the helium program of the Army and Navy.

In addition to the above, it must be remembered that the natural gases containing helium are being continually consumed for domestic and industrial purposes. It therefore behooves the Government to expedite in every possible way the development of processes for separation of helium before it is irretrievably lost.

Real Economy Versus False Economy in Maintaining the Efficiency of the American Navy.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLFRED W. LUFKIN,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 5, 1920.

Mr. LUFKIN. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this appropriation solely on the ground of a naval necessity. I want to say at the outset in reply to the remarks on Saturday of my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts, that I have no navy yard in my district. Neither have I any large number of constituents employed in any yard. At all events I have none sufficiently interested to write and ask my support of this appropriation. So, unlike the gentleman from Massachusetts, I have not heard the voice of organized labor calling upon me to support this proposition lest some of its members residing in my district lose their jobs. But, Mr. Speaker, I have heard another voice calling—the voice of the Navy Department. It was not the voice of the Secretary of the Navy, who might, perchance, be accused of playing politics, but it was the voices of the admirals at the head of the various bureaus, the professional managers of the American Navy, the officers who are charged under the law with the responsibility of keeping the fleet up to fighting trim. It is no especial concern to these officers whether a man loses his job or not. They are not in politics, and it would be of no especial concern to them if an entire yard were closed down altogether, so far as the employees are concerned; but it is of especial concern to them that these ships should be put back in condition at the earliest possible moment. That is their job, and they are responsible for it.

Mr. Speaker, there are two kinds of economy—real economy and false economy. Real economy consists in saving money, not for to-day alone but for all time, while false economy consists in saving $1 to-day and having to spend $2 to-morrow as a result of that saving.

The latter is exactly the kind of economy which this House will be guilty of practicing if it denies this appropriation. If we are to have an up-to-date Navy—and I do not believe that there is any gentleman on this floor who believes that we should not have a Navy of the very highest standard—these ships must be repaired sometime. If they are not repaired this year the work will have to be done next year, or possibly the year after. Admiral Taylor, of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, is probably the greatest and most successful shipbuilder in the entire world. He will tell you to-day, just as he has told the Naval Committee, that the longer this work is delayed the more expensive it will be. Nothing deteriorates more rapidly than a modern battleship. They wear out fast enough, God knows, at best; but once they get run down and out of condition this deterioration increases by leaps and bounds.

Now, just one word as to the reason for the necessity for this large deficiency. Many arguments have been advanced in the debate on Saturday and to-day, but I have heard no one as yet exactly hit the nail on the head. It is true that the Naval Committee last summer, in the short time at its disposal in which to prepare a bill and in its anxiety to economize, may have cut down these appropriations a little too far. It is likewise true that the cost of labor and of materials have increased enormously since that time. But to my mind the underlying reason which makes this appropriation necessary is the fact that no one in the Navy Department began to realize how much would be taken out of the ships engaged in the transport service. For months and months these ships were in constant commission, first in carrying troops and supplies to Europe and then in bringing the men back. There was no time, there was no opportunity to give these vessels even a partial overhauling. The orders were, "Drive them just as hard as you can and get all you can out of them, regardless of the consequences," with the result that during the period when our soldiers were being brought home there was case after case where the entire stop at each terminal was simply a matter of hours. The men were unloaded or loaded, as the case might be; coal and supplies were hurried on board; and the great ship started on its return voyage, often on the same day on which it had arrived in port. The results were disastrous to the condition of these ships. They did their work well, and now let us make it possible to put them back into shape again. Let us pass this appropriation at once and thus put our Navy back where it was 18 months ago, not, perhaps, the largest, but the best kept, the best officered, the best manned, and the most efficient of any Navy in the entire world.

Repair the Navy Ships Now.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD OLNEY,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 4, 1920.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Speaker, I strongly advocate an immediate appropriation of $10,000,000 for the repair and upkeep of scores of United States Navy vessels which are rapidly disintegrating and rusting away from negligence due to lack of funds. If this fund is not forthcoming in the near future it means the disorganization of 14,000 skilled mechanics well adapted to repair Navy ships. If this appropriation in contemplation is delayed for even a year, this splendid body of employees will have become disintegrated and skilled shipbuilders will not be available, and many fine Navy ships which were indispensable during the war will of necessity be consigned to the scrap heap. This is not entirely a question of keeping men under employment, but primarily concerns the maintenance of a permanent and efficient Navy establishment. The United States Navy is just as much a part of Oklahoma and Minnesota as it relates to Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Virginia, New York, Texas, and California, where navy yards may exist.

It is false economy to-day to neglect the maintenance and repair of the many fine ships which, driven under full steam during the war and since the signing of the armistice, have had no time and opportunity to be put into "shipshape," so to speak.

Therefore, let us think and act to-day in a broad, patriotic manner and pass without equivocation these amendments granting $10,000,000 for purposes of repairing United States Navy vessels. "A stitch in time saves nine," and if you believe in the maintenance of an efficient Navy it is incumbent upon the Members to-day to take a stitch to-day, appropriate this sum for repair work in the Navy, and thereby save many millions of dollars by postponing the Navy program.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. S. D. FESS,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 5, 1920.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address before the Indiana Editorial Association, Indianapolis, January 2, 1920.

The address is as follows:

AN ADDRESS BEFORE THE INDIANA EDITORIAL ASSOCIATION, INDIANAPOLIS, JANUARY 2, 1920, BY HON. S. D. FESS, OF OHIO.

Gentlemen of the Editorial Association, I have come to talk to you on the national situation as it appears to me. At this time I would not have left Washington were I not convinced of the need to embrace this opportunity to get before you specific information upon which you can better form a judgment of the character of propaganda now in vogue under the present régime to cloud the people's minds to the frightful incompetency of Democratic administration. The source of the activity of the Democratic press is well known. The timidity of the Republican press under threats of sedition legislation is equally well known.

The entire machinery of the Government has been converted into publicity agencies for Democratic propaganda for self-perpetuation in power. The President was not aloof from this propaganda. His attitude toward Republicans in the prosecution of the war demonstrated that he was attempting to make it a Democratic Party war. His palpable determination to exclude the council of men of ability not belonging to his inner circle until he was compelled to call upon Republican leaders of the House to put through his major war measures against the violent opposition of Speaker CLARK; Chairman KITCHIN, of the Ways and Means Committee and floor leader; Chairman DENT, of the Military Committee; and others is not in dispute.

His assumption of the direction of the campaign for the continuance of Democratic control of both the House and Senate, in which war agencies such as the Hoover Food Administration joined, was the sensation of our political history. Republicans were compelled to witness the agencies created by them for the defense of the Nation in her greatest crisis employed to perpetuate the most curious polyglot of self-advertisers and political theorists in the name of patriotism ever collected in one center. Public information emanating from Washington upon which the people were to base judgment was such as the impossible George Creel allowed to pass his socialistic bureau.

CRITICISM PREVENTED.

Freedom of criticism in speech and the press was such as would pass the Department of Justice in the light of the espionage act, and Postmaster General Burleson in control not only of the mails but the wires, telephones, and cables as well.

An example of this freedom is the threat from American headquarters in Europe that if European criticism of the proposed League of Nations was not stopped the peace council would be removed from France; of course, we heard nothing more than fulsome praise of the work of the commission thereafter. Another example is the case of the demand of dismissal of a Washington correspondent of a great newspaper in a great city because of a certain dispatch published touching certain unofficial conduct of a distinguished Democrat.

The more than 30 bulletins published at the Capital at Government expense by the departments under the execution ostensibly for the dissemination of information, but actually and more distinctively as mere Democratic publicity sheets for the promulgation of the present régime, have reached the stage of nausea. Over 30,000,000 copies of speeches of the President and members of the Cabinet were printed and distributed at public expense in this propaganda. One million copies of McAdoo's speech to railway men in Altoona, Pa., is an example of this campaign.

HOW NEWS IS MADE IN WASHINGTON.

Notwithstanding the distaste of the American people for such official prostitution, as was evidenced by the last election, this same sort of distortion of facts is still going on with headquarters in Washington whence make-believe dispatches are regularly sent out by the reporters, as is so notorious in the dispatches touching the league status, where the public is led to conclusions without warrant of fact. More than one reporter, knowing the character of news items touching such and such question that is wanted by the policy of his paper, includes with his story a private note to the editor correcting the statement, and leaving it to the publisher's decision as to what to print. This explains why the most that has been written from Washington on the league status has to be corrected by subsequent dispatches.

THE FAMOUS FILIBUSTER RECALLED.

This same propaganda is seen in the Democratic charge that this Congress has done nothing. Let us look at the situation as revealed by the facts. The charge by the Democrats that Republican filibuster in the Senate defeated the appropriation bills in the last Congress is an example. Eight bills failed. The Democrats controlled both House and Senate. Some of the bills did not reach the Senate until March 3, the day before adjournment. Some of the bills were not even reported from the Democratic Senate committees. Finally, many Senators becoming disgusted, knowing there was not a physical possibility of passing eight supply bills in the 18 hours remaining, three men—two Republicans and one Democrat—decided that they would compel an extra session, which the exigencies of the World War demanded and which the country well knew the President did not want to call. These three Senators held the floor for 18 hours. This was the famous filibuster. What was the result? An extra session was called for May 19. Republicans took the helm. The end of the fiscal year, June 30, after Congress had been in session but six weeks, saw not only the eight supply bills through both Houses but a saving from the estimates of the former Democratic Congress of $40,000,000 per day each day the Congress had been in session. So much for that Democratic misrepresentation.

WORK OF THE SPECIAL SESSION.

What was accomplished in the special session about which the Democratic publicity department is working overtime? The total number of public laws enacted was 93—more than were enacted in the last session of the Democratic Congress. Besides this, there were 21 public resolutions passed. The total number of committee reports was 368, as against 145 reported by the last Democratic session. Of the 368 reported, 239 were acted upon by the House, as against 101 in the last session of the Democratic Congress. Among the most important measures will be found the various deficiency bills, woman suffrage, national prohibition, rehabilitation of wounded soldiers, return of the wires, including the cables, several protective measures on dyes and other American industries, facilitation of export trade, regulation of alien rights, law to facilitate agricultural marketing, provision to complete the Alaskan railroad, reclamation of arid regions in the West, and the enforcement of the prohibition act. Among measures which have passed the House and awaiting action in the Senate are the Esch railroad bill, the Greene merchant-marine bill, the Good budget bill, the Smoot-Sinnott gas, oil, and coal land leasing bill, the water-power bill, the Fess rehabilitation of cripples bill, and many others. During this time the Senate has had before it the problem of ending the war without the loss of American sovereignty.

I challenge the history of legislation to show a better record of work accomplished.

There is nothing so influential in molding public opinion as facts. Before them propaganda does not get far. It is the province of the editor as well as his duty to lay before the public the facts and allow the citizen to draw his conclusions which he will not hesitate to do. Republican Members of Congress from the first were aware of the problems, complicated and cumulative, under Democratic incompetency, and did what they could to get the facts before the country, in which the Republican press gave valiant assistance. The country, in spite of the organized effort to manufacture public clamor for Democratic support and in spite of the incredible partisan effort of the President, decisively rebuked the Democratic administration by returning a Republican majority in both branches of Congress.

PROGRESS OF THE PRESENT SESSION.

What did the new Congress find? A national debt, which before the war was less than a billion, now beyond twenty-five billion, to which will be added three and one-half billion more by next June. An annual outlay was required for all the Government's needs of a billion dollars before the war; now a greater sum than that is demanded to pay the interest on the public debt. Last year the Democratic Congress provided $4,000,000,000 for this year's expenditures, and against our urgency that that sum would not be enough to care for all unliquidated obligations, we were assured that if the executive departments would employ economy it would be sufficient. To-day the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury notifies us that we have spent the $4,000,000,000 and now face a deficit of three and one-half billions. At the same time we have a message from the White House asking Congress to reduce taxation. Republicans are not familiar with that school of finance which teaches how to pay a deficit of three and one-half times as great as the total expenditures of the Government for any one year before the war by reducing taxation. Of course, we can not reduce taxation while this expense persists, but we must find new sources of revenue; and we must take steps in due time toward a sounder system of taxation and finance, and by all means avoid the danger of drying up the sources of revenue by destroying the impetus for business. We must remember that the power to tax is the power to destroy.

Our chief concern should be to offer such encouragement to business as to insure investment of capital that labor may be steadily employed. Too much interference and too heavy burdens will defeat our very purpose. Income tax can not go much higher. It would drive the incomes into investment in nontaxable securities, such as municipal, State, and Federal bonds. The excess-profits tax, unsound and unscientific as it is, is here until we find something better. Much talk is heard of a sales tax. This problem Republicans will meet as they will solve other problems, not by vagaries but by sound principles of finance.

GLARING INCONSISTENCIES.

The President's advice to reduce taxation in the face of this stupendous deficit reminds the country of his promise of no more war, and even while yet in Europe insuring the world against war, cabling to his Secretary of the Navy to promote a naval program which would place us equal to Britain in three years. His Secretary of War, the other military arm of the Government, urges an Army of 576,000 men, which would cost, it is estimated, at least one and one-half billion dollars. Of course, Congress will listen to no such vagaries. Even with a small Army and Navy our expenditures for next year are placed by the Secretary of the Treasury at the mammoth sum of four and one-half billions, and that two years after the war closed. The fear is that this figure will be greatly increased before the estimates are finally in. This means that through the wasteful extravagance of the administration, some of it inevitable and some of it absolutely unpardonable and indefensible, we have pushed up the cost level all along the line until what cost our Government before we had entered upon this wild orgy of expenditure the sum of $1,000,000,000 is from now on to cost three to four times that amount, with less service rendered.

OUR DUTY—HOW RESPECTED.

Our duty here is clear. We must retrench on expenditure and refuse every unnecessary drain both by the Government and by the people. It is proper that the Government should set the example. The public will not lose sight of the fact that these Government expenditures are not of Congress but of the executive departments. In the special session we reduced the expenditures below the estimates of the executive departments over one and one-half billions. In this present session thus far we have saved millions in the four appropriation bills already passed—Indian, Post Office, Diplomatic, and rivers and harbors. In the last we cut from forty-two to twelve millions, or a reduction of 71 per cent. In the Agricultural bill just reported we have cut from forty-two millions to thirty-one millions. We will not enact a public buildings bill this session, notwithstanding the needs of some localities. We will cut to the bone, and the present indications are that we will save another billion dollars this year below the estimates sent in by the executive departments.

This Congress has pressed upon the Executive the necessity of certain economies. We have demanded an immediate dismantling of the war machine. This proves to be a slow process. We have demanded the discontinuance of various war agencies called into existence for war, many of them of doubtful value even for that purpose. This is not progressing as it should. There were brought to Washington alone over 100,000 clerks for war work. Sometime after the armistice this number instead of decreasing had increased. Every such agency is clamoring for continuance in the name of progressive legislation. It appears if one agency is discontinued the beneficiaries are transferred to some other Government department. Once attach a man or woman to Uncle Sam's pay roll, and it will take an earthquake to separate him from the service. Legislation is now pending to compel this economy. In one bureau where recently it was stated 19,000 clerks were employed, it is declared that the work can be done by one-third of the force. A bill introduced by Senator SMOOT is now before Congress looking for such reduction, and will certainly become law unless vetoed by the President, and even in that case, it may be made law dependent on whether the Democrats will continue to resist economy. The only way Congress can reach this situation, if the Executive does not act, is to refuse to make the appropriations; hence the importance of cutting to the bone every appropriation.

SURPLUS WAR MATERIAL.

The vast surplus war material collected during the war must be salvaged, and the proceeds covered into the Treasury. This is a third economy we are pressing upon the Executive. There was over $100,000,000 voted for the Housing Corporation to house war workers. This corporation instead of taking steps to salvage this property, proposed without authority to make itself a permanent Government bureau, and go into the real estate business to handle houses for rental on behalf of the Government. One of the first steps taken was to raise salaries, and this after the armistice was signed. One salary was raised from $5,000 to $12,000. After investigation of this agency, whose conduct was no more glaring than numerous others, Congress, in the House, unanimously abolished the corporation. On this vote the Democrats joined the Republicans, largely because the fight was led by a Democrat from Florida [Mr. CLARK], who had begun his investigation of this bureau in the previous Congress. Unfortunately in nearly if not all the other cases of exposure and efforts to correct them, the Democratic minority almost solidly resist what we attempt to do and make the charge that we are playing politics. Their conduct in resisting the exposure and defending the waste on the ground of necessity, and their efforts to increase appropriations on every hand, are under suspicion.

The puerile efforts of KITCHIN to resist the economy program and the readiness of Democrats to add items of expense show their hand. This exposure must be made in the interests of the country, not for the purpose of bringing the administration into disrepute but to bring the guilty parties under the law and lay the foundation for a discontinuance of the wasteful extravagance that still persists. This Congress forced the Secretary of War to put upon the market vast stores of surplus foods. We also forced vast masses of other material on the market, but not until frightful loss was suffered in various ways from exposure.

GOVERNMENT MUST GIVE BUSINESS A CHANCE.

We insist that the Government must lose no time to get out of business into which it entered under the stress of war and give enterprise a chance to return to an efficient and economic management rather than continue in an inefficient and extravagant political management which has so marked this administration from the very beginning. The most dangerous and hurtful experiment yet made is the substitution for efficient management this socialistic and paternalistic control so prominent under President Wilson.

We have already ordered back the telephone, telegraph, wireless, and cables. We have taken all but the final steps to return the railways to private ownership, which will be done before the 1st of March. We in the House have also taken the final step to supersede political management and operation of our merchant marine by efficient and economic, because responsible, management. This measure has already passed in the House and is now in the Senate and will soon have action.

Congress must turn a deaf ear to the promoter who assures us that in order that we may not lose all we have already paid in we must continue to pour out the people's money into various ventures. Congress voted $20,000,000 for a nitrate plant as a war measure. It was invested in the famous Muscle Shoals project in Alabama, which had been decisively turned down by Congress annually for the past 15 years. To the $20,000,000 was added $40,000,000 out of the President's emergency fund voted him to be used in possible unseen emergencies that might arise. The unfinished plant is there, the money is gone, and now we are told that we must appropriate still more to finish it or lose what we have already put in; yet no man believes that it will ever be a success as a nitrate plant. This is but one example of Government business, which can be duplicated in other lines. This Congress is aware of this seductive argument whether from an executive department or a local interest.

BUSINESS BUDGET.

Another step Congress has taken to guard the Treasury is the adoption of a business budget system to place our expenditures on a rational basis, by which we take from the executive department, which is the spending department, the right of audit, and give this right to Congress, the authorizing department. We also make the Executive responsible for the estimates submitted. We have passed such a measure through the House and it has already been favorably reported in the Senate.

INCREASE THE PURCHASING POWER OF THE DOLLAR.

Another step the Government must take is to increase the purchasing power of the dollar. This is not the function of the legislative but of the executive department. With the wild expenditure of public money the Treasury Department undertook to keep step. It borrowed and expended over $30,000,000,000. This vastly expanded the credit of the country. It was an inevitable result of the war, and as such is not subject to criticism, save in the lax methods employed in the estimates and contracts. But while the business of the country expanded 20 per cent, which was the real measure of money needs, the Federal reserve notes increased in circulation 63 per cent. That means over 40 per cent inflation of our currency, which further inflated our overexpanded credit. The result is the dollar to-day buys 56 per cent of what it did before the war.

Our per capita circulation, which was about $34 before the war, reached at one time as high as $57, and is still $54. Over $3,000,000,000 of this circulation is in Federal reserve notes, and based upon $1,000,000,000 of gold, the rest in commercial paper of variable value. Our danger here is to avoid a paper basis, upon which all Europe early in the war went, and is now in an insufferable stage, calling upon us to help her out of the slough of despond. Our duty now is to take steps to reach normal or disaster awaits us. We must guard against the sob pleas of Europe to further endanger our financial situation by attempting to finance them, which may force us into the same crisis. The increase of the purchasing power of the dollar is not the province of Congress but of the Treasury Department, through the Federal Reserve Board. This warning has been given in Congress time and again, and at last steps are being taken to offer some relief.

A WARNING SOUNDED.

Another serious question confronting us is the pressure from all Europe and many of our own financial centers for further financing of Europe. I want now to sound a warning to what we are bound to face in the not distant future. It will be a demand already quite vocal for our cancellation of the loans we extended to Europe. These reach $9,660,000,000. Up to date Europe has not paid any interest. We have deferred collecting it because of their inability to pay even that much. If we include the interest due as a portion of the loan, Europe's obligation to us will reach beyond $10,000,000,000. Clemenceau recently officially announced he wanted an early meeting of the League of Nations to take steps to internationalize the war debt. A member of the Chamber of Deputies recently and openly declared on the floor that the United States must be compelled to pay its share. If, say these statesmen, the United States fought to make the world safe for democracy its duty is not performed until it has shared the cost of the war. Overtures are being made to cancel these obligations throughout the foreign press on the ground that our duty is equal to our ability in wealth. These are finding responses in this country; first, from among financial leaders who from a business point of view are anxious to help finance Europe's needs; secondly, emotional souls who think with their feelings; and, thirdly, men and women who enjoy proving themselves the world's Santa Claus by using the peoples' money for charitable purposes. They accept the President's view of a war for democracy instead of in defense of American honor and American rights.

For myself I am through voting further Government extension of credit. I voted for the Edge bill which is now a law, which the proponents declared would permit financial interests to do this work and avoid having the Government take it up. We were assured that the Government would not be further called upon. Sir George Paish, the British representative of a movement to induce the United States to assume Europe's burdens, made in New York only a few days ago the fanciful proposition that the nations, through the authority of the League of Nations, issue international bonds to the amount of $35,000,000,000 to be guaranteed by all the nations in the league. This failing, we are now asked to join an international financial conference to consider the problem. The country owes Secretary Glass a debt of gratitude for his statesmanlike declaration that we could not enter such a conference except under specified conditions. In spite of all the facts we were recently asked to extend to Europe credit to the amount of $4,000,000,000, we are now urged again by the White House to extend a loan of $500,000,000 at first, but now reduced to $150,000,000. Press dispatches tell us of huge piles of food rotting on the docks at Danzig. The remedy in Europe is the same as it is here. They must go to work. Lloyd-George stated recently that there were 400,000 men in England who decline to return to work. Let the benevolent of our land distribute their alms through the Red Cross but go slow in Government policy of spending public funds.

HIGH COST OF LIVING AND DEMAGOGIC TREATMENT.

The most distressing feature to-day grows out of the high-cost level of living. The attitude of this administration toward that question is the most culpable. It is a political play with the possibility of dire results. Last session, after Congress had passed all the appropriation bills and the committees were at work holding hearings on reconstructive measures, such as the railroads, their work was continuously interrupted by a Member on the Democratic side, acting for the Democratic minority, making points of no quorum, when the committees would have to adjourn to come to the floor of the House. There were 184 Members on committees which were sitting during the sessions of the House, by order of the House, in order to report the measures to the House for consideration. This filibuster on the part of one Member defeated expeditious work and led to a decision to take a month's recess to allow the committees to get ready and report for consideration. The matter was presented to the Senate. It was agreed to take that plan. The resolution was adopted on Tuesday for the recess to begin the following Saturday. Both CLARK and KITCHIN joined in the proposal. On the afternoon of Friday the Speaker of the House received a letter from the President requesting that Congress cancel its plan of recess and remain in Washington to reduce the cost of living by enacting more laws. Ladies and gentlemen, I regard that political play of the Executive on a level with "He kept us out of war."

CAUSES OF THE HIGH-COST LEVEL.

It is to be deplored that false hopes are created by the assumption from high authority that the high-cost level is a matter of legislation, and if it is not lowered Congress is at fault.

This political play was overworked by the Department of Justice, which published its success in lowering the cost while the price current was steadily rising. The high level of cost is not due to lack of legislation. It is due to a policy of inaction of the executive department on the one hand and methods of business on the other. In the building of the war machine the Government became the responsible builder. It scoured the country for labor, the wages of which constitute at least 80 per cent of the cost of any article, taking both skilled and unskilled in aviation fields, cantonments, shipyards, munition plants, and all industries doing war work. It thus became the major employer of labor. It dealt in borrowed money. It never asked the cost. It simply ordered the work. It took at least six distinct steps, each one of which pushed higher the cost level:

1. Abnormally increased wages.
2. Shortened hours of work.
3. Time and a half for overtime, double for Sundays.
4. Increased number of workers to the piece.
5. Entered upon housing of labor.
6. Paid transportation from outlying districts to the center.

Every industry not engaged in war work was compelled to meet the Government in competition for labor, hence the Government's wage scale became the scale of all industries and the added cost was passed on to the public. These items alone would more than double the cost of work. This was not Congress, but the executive departments.

In addition the Government adopted the cost-plus contract, which at once was a signal for a new and higher schedule; the higher the cost, the higher the plus. No man will ever know how much this vicious contract added to the cost of production. Then Congress assisted in adopting the Democratic excess-profits tax which virtually said, "Profiteer all you wish and the Government will take 60 or 80 per cent of it." No man will ever know how much this item added to the level of cost. All together we see a very abnormally high cost. The cost of living always goes higher than the cost of labor. Wages consequently can not come down with living higher than wages. Of course, living can not come down much without lowering wages.

The reports of the Government agencies scouring the country for labor for Muscle Shoals, the promises made, the character of labor obtained, and the style of work secured leave nothing wanting to explain the cost level of Government work. It is a worse orgy of wild expenditure than that at Hog Island.

PLAYING THE ENDS AGAINST THE MIDDLE—INEVITABLE RESULTS.

This policy of wage boosting was pleasing to labor. The cost-plus contract was satisfactory to capital. Every thinking person knows why living cost is up, but how to reduce it is a difficult problem. The claim that Congress is at fault because it does not provide authority to reduce it, is a type of demagogy hard to believe that anyone holding a high position would adopt. I defy any man to show where the Government has interfered that prices have not gone up. The suggestion that the remedy lies in legislation is fraught with great danger. It would not be so considered were it made by an irresponsible politician seeking public favor. But when made by the President, it at once gives courage to the radical agitator, the revolutionist, the I. W. W., and the anti-Government promoters. It stimulates their attacks upon the Government, which they charge in quoting high authority is responsible for the inequalities among men, instead of the real causes, such as indolence, extravagance, or lack of obeying the simple laws of success. It gives ground for the demand that government by law must cure the ills of life. It serves as the foundation of their complaints. In turn it causes ambitious leaders to use the Government to further their ends on the make-believe of relief. It thus gives the politician a new issue to harangue the populace on the shortcomings of the Government.

The fault is not a lack of law, but a failure to enforce what law we have. Recently this fact was brought forcibly before the country.

We passed an act forcibly deporting all alien enemies interned during the war. The arrests were made, the subjects were corraled at Ellis Island, but no deportations were made, and some of them were soon out at large again. Congress authorized the House Immigration Committee to go to Ellis Island and ascertain why the deportation did not take place. The committee was armed by resolution of Congress with the necessary authority to get the facts. It was in this way that the sympathy of such men as the former immigration commissioner, Fred. Howe, with the very classes we were attempting to corral was learned. It was there learned how difficult it was to deal with these antigovernment elements with the apparent if not established bolshevik sympathy of the authorities who must enforce the law if it is enforced. If laws are not enforced, it is not because of the want of law but rather the laxness of the officers with whom the enforcement must rest. Congress has not hesitated in its duties in legislation. Its work is a matter of record. The cost of living is not due to any lack of legislation.

GOVERNMENT WASTE AND ITS RESULTS.

The high cost level is chiefly due to the frightfully wasteful methods of production and the great losses by frequent changes of plans and contract where the cost was marked off as so much loss due to the war. The destructiveness of war in itself, where all production was for unproductive consumption or actual waste, had much to do with the high cost of living.

This cost level was also greatly stimulated by our wild incompetency in business. The wasteful methods employed are suggested by pertinent facts, a few of which may be mentioned. For example, we spent $1,055,000,000 for airplanes, and at the time of signing the armistice we had 196 American-built planes, all told, on the front—$5,275,000 for each plane is the price we pay for this management. Notwithstanding this, we are told we must supply vast sums to purchase private plants built in war time. We have thus far refused to do it. The War Department spent $191,182,850 for artillery and delivered on the firing line 72 American-made guns—$2,500,000 for each gun. The procurement division ordered 845,000 saddles and 1,000,000 sets of harness for 391,000 horses.

GOVERNMENT AND PERSONAL EXTRAVAGANCE.

The fabulous prices paid for Government operation inculcated a stage of extravagance among our people difficult to realize. Borrowed money in the billions was lavishly distributed among the people who in turn entered a revelry of expenditure never before experienced. The remedy here is not so much law as change of habit. We must produce more and spend less. There is no other way. We must abandon the policy of restricting production either by shorter hours or decreased efficiency. The law should be "decreased cost and increased efficiency," but, unfortunately, it is "decreased efficiency and increased cost." The most obvious illustration is the political operation of transportation where the first nine months of 1919 saw an increased operating expense over the first nine months of 1917 of $1,240,000,000, and a decrease in traffic of 39,000,000,000 ton-miles. Notwithstanding this startling inefficiency, the Plumb plan is still urged in some circles.

STRIDES OF SOCIALISM STIMULATED BY WOODROW WILSON.

This administration, markedly socialistic from the beginning, has used the war to capitalize its theories. President Wilson talks freely and frequently of the necessity of "putting wages on a new footing." The present footing of wages is that of contract. Of course, he means from the footing of contract between employer and employee to the soviet scheme in which the employer is displaced by the committee of employees in which there is no contract. His much-talked "democratization of industry," in which he demands that industry must be compelled to admit labor in the management is, of course, the open door to sovietizing industry; for if labor of its own right can demand representation in the directory of a business, it can of its own right and will demand a majority of it, which is complete sovietization. The President's fondness for socialism is seen in the most motly group of self-advertisers collected about the administration ever before given prominence. The roll is a long one. The Department of Labor especially is overloaded. The public readily recalls Frank P. Walsh, Louis Post, Fred Howe, Densmore, and George Creel at the head of a bureau full of socialists, if not of Bolsheviki beliefs. It is not unfair to mention the Secretary of War in connection with peculiar isms. It will be recalled that the President wrote his felicitations to the Soviet conference at Brest-Litovsk, the first Bolsheviki venture, and in that connection it would be well to read the reply, as printed in the New York Times. The fondness of the present head of the Government for such men as Bullitt, Steffens, Herron, Hale, and the crew of satellites taken to Paris, and his willingness to advise the Prinkipo conference with the Bolsheviki, all indicate the strides this Government has taken recently in unstabilizing the institutions of America. In a brief space of time the most substantial of all Governments has become a topic of concern, in which Russian Sovietism is favored by high authority.

RADICAL MENACE IN AMERICAN LABOR LEADERSHIP.

In the face of these facts no one should be surprised at the ominous movement of radical syndicalism in labor circles. Foster and Fitzpatrick and leaders of their type undoubtedly join other radical of radicals in looking to the President as their own, as was indicated by the recent convention of radicals who looked to him as their standard bearer. This intervention on behalf of Mr. Mooney was not a matter of surprise. It was President Wilson who stimulated the brotherhoods to demand the Adamson law back in 1916. The brotherhoods still persist that they did not want to take their case to Congress. That was sowing to the wind, and we have been reaping the whirlwind ever since.

I warn American labor against the dangers of radical leadership which demands a change in the law of contract. I also warn the Republic against this class legislation. Anything that is against the public welfare can not be in the interest of labor. That is why in the solution of such questions as the rail problem the Plumb plan is simply impossible. I will admit that profit on behalf of ready investment must be respected; income on behalf of the security holder must also be respected; and wages on behalf of the laborer must be respected. But beyond all these, economic management and efficient service must be respected on behalf of the vast public which pays all the bills. Any policy against the public can not from the nature of the case be in the interest either of labor, capital, or security holders. The public being the chief factor explains why we must find a way to prevent the tie-up of transportation incident to quarrels between the employer and the employee without resort to either the strike or lockout. This and other industrial problems will be solved and by this Congress and without undue delay. I assure you they will be solved in the interest of the greatest good to the greatest number.

THE POLITICAL OUTLOOK.

Ladies and gentlemen, in the face of the most ominous problems ever presented to this country—financial, industrial, economic, and governmental—we must not lose sight of the supreme duty of the hour. The people will soon be called upon to decide whether they wish to continue this experiment of paternalistic and socialistic administration, this orgy of incompetency. They will decide it this year. The decision goes not only to the executive but to the legislative also. Here is the legislative situation: The present House consists of 435 Members—240 Republicans, 192 Democrats, and 3 independents. Two of the independents—RANDALL of California and CARSS, of Minnesota, vote with the Democrats; the third, KELLER, of Minnesota, votes with the Republicans. This gives a Republican majority of 47.

PROSPECTS OF THE NEXT HOUSE.

A change of 24 votes from the Republican to the Democratic column would give the Democrats the control of the House by 1 vote if the Independents remain in Congress and continue their present affiliation. In the coming campaign the Democrats start with 108 Members from the solid South, not including the States of Kentucky, Missouri, and Maryland. In the latter States the Republicans have broken the ranks. In the election last year they made an even break in the State of Maryland, won 5 of the 16 districts of Missouri, and 4 of the 11 in Kentucky. In the election just closed, where we elected a Republican governor of Kentucky by over 40,000, we cast a majority vote in 7 of the 11 congressional districts. In our last congressional elections the people decisively rebuked the incompetency of the present régime, and in States like Indiana the voters not only retained all the sitting Republican Members, but excluded every vestige of Democratic membership from the House, thus carrying over into the Republican column districts hitherto always regarded as safely Democratic. We will have a fight to continue this unanimous representation in Indiana. A similar situation is found in four States—Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, and West Virginia. It is also present in some isolated districts throughout the country.

DISTURBING ELEMENTS.

The Nonpartisan League's activity has somewhat unsettled stable conditions in Minnesota, the Dakotas, and other portions of the West. The Berger agitation is a factor in Wisconsin. The liquor agitation is figuring in New Jersey. Some of these contingencies favor the Democrats, while others the Republicans. The advantage is with the Republicans.

The Republican record on the liquor and suffrage questions is a distinct advantage to the Republicans. The play of the present administration to purchase by special favor the radical union-labor vote will have a decided reaction, a fact already established by the recent elections, as evidenced in Massachusetts, where law and order became the deciding issue.

I do not expect to lose any districts unless there becomes a decided drift away from the Republicans toward which the tide is now running. On the other hand, I confidently expect to win at least one in Massachusetts, three in New York, three in New Jersey, four in Pennsylvania, two in Ohio, two in Kentucky, two in Missouri, one in Kansas, one in South Dakota, one in Nevada, two in Utah, and two in California. We have a fighting chance to win an additional Member in Alabama, North Carolina, Tennessee, Oklahoma, Missouri, Arizona, Kentucky, West Virginia, Virginia, Ohio, Michigan, and Massachusetts. If the present drift is continued, we will control the next House by at least 90 majority. We have a better chance of winning 24 seats now occupied by Democrats than of losing 17 in which the Democrats claim advantage. We have an equal chance in at least 12 other districts to offset their chance in an equal number on which they are depending. In every recent contest the issue was favorable to the Republicans. In the eighth Kentucky we changed a Democratic majority from 3,000 to a Republican majority of 1,700. In Oklahoma a similar change. In Alabama we cut a Democratic majority of 3,663 to 406. In North Carolina from 4,000 to about 1,000. This shows the drift in the face of the greatest fight ever put up by the Democrats.

PROSPECTS OF THE NEXT SENATE.

The Senate presents an interesting situation. Thirty-two States will elect this year. Eight of them are now Democratic and conceded to remain so: Florida, Louisiana, Oklahoma, Arkansas, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama. Eleven will return Republicans: Connecticut, Iowa, Kansas, North Dakota, Indiana, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Vermont, Washington, Wisconsin, and Utah. In four States now held by Republicans the Democrats are centering fights: Missouri, New Hampshire, New York, and Ohio. It is my judgment they will not win in either State, while each State presents a local situation Republicans will win. In seven States now Democratic the Republicans will have the best chance for victory: Kentucky, Idaho, California, South Dakota, Nevada, Colorado, and Maryland. We expect to control the Senate by at least 16 votes.

Ladies and gentlemen, every consideration of country calls upon the editors to get before the people the necessity of a united front to elect not only the President, the Senate, and the House, but to insure the States as well. Our greatest danger is overconfidence. The dissatisfaction over the present régime is so universal that citizens think there is nothing to it. Herein lies the danger. Our slogan must be to strike the line hard; we must not fumble, and we will not foul. We must go down the line from President to local official. This of all years every citizen must do his duty.

Agricultural Appropriation Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. McKINLEY,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 5, 1920.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, man can get along very comfortably without a watch or a piano or an automobile. He can even live without a horse and wagon. My grandfather lived happily for 50 years before a railroad was built in the United States. A man must have food regularly. If he does not get it, he dies. Food, therefore, is absolutely the essential thing so long as mankind stays on earth.

While some departments of the Government are being severely criticized for reckless waste of money, I am glad to say that the Department of Agriculture is not so charged. The department that was to develop fighting planes, that never flew, spent more money in two years than has been expended by the Department of Agriculture in the 140 years the Republic has been organized. Although an army can not exist without food, I fear you will find some Members of Congress opposing an appropriation of $30,000,000 for development of agriculture and voting a thousand millions for war. It has been my observation that very little party politics has crept into the Department of Agriculture. The heads of the bureaus and the scientists are a group of earnest, hardworking, and sadly underpaid men. We would like to increase their salaries, but are faced by a deficit of three thousand millions of dollars caused by indiscriminate, useless war waste in other departments during the past three years.

The life of the Nation comes from the food of the farms. Therefore it does seem as if we were saving by the pint cup and expending by the barrel when we limit the appropriation for the improvement of agriculture to $30,000,000 and spend over thirty times that much for Army and Navy.

Permit me to itemize the Agricultural appropriation bill for 1920 and give the department estimate for needs of 1921. The latter will doubtless be reduced before we pass the pending bill:

In Illinois, where I live, the farmers perhaps appreciate most the men county agents, of whom there are about 2,000 in the United States, and the women farm demonstrators, numbering about 800. This work was first begun in the South some years before there was any special appropriation for it, money being used from funds provided for the extermination of cotton pests, and these funds being supplemented by State and local appropriations.

I understand at this time every county in South Carolina has a county agent, more than half of whose pay comes from the State and counties. Of the 2,850 agricultural counties in the United States, more than 2,000 now have county agricultural agents or county home demonstration agents, or both, and an average of $4,000 per county is provided by the State and Nation for this work. The Northern States must look to their laurels on agriculture or the South will outstrip them. I was much surprised to learn about eight years ago that the banner corn yield of Illinois was 150 bushels per acre and of South Carolina 228 bushels per acre. The reason for that is the longer season of hot weather, which has permitted a certain kind of corn to be grown that would not mature in the North. I remember traveling through Mississippi, Georgia, and Florida 40 years ago and seeing cattle that would weigh about 400 pounds and worth about $10 per head. In 1919 the South produced the United States champions of the Shorthorn, Hereford, and Angus breeds. There are 75,000,000 hogs—I mean on four legs—in the United States at this time, the value of these hogs being estimated at fifteen thousand millions of dollars. This indicates the magnitude of the industry. When I was a boy the farmer expected, over a period of five years, to lose a good percentage of his hogs from cholera. Well do I remember when, at the age of 11 years, I lost my entire fortune of $17 that I had invested in two hogs just shipped in from Missouri. They died of cholera.

In 1913 the department actively took up the work of cholera eradication. In that year 118 out of every 1,000 hogs died of cholera. In 1916, 66 per 1,000 died, and in 1919, 37 only out of 1,000, a reduction of two-thirds in six years. Various hog-cholera serums, of an estimated value of $6,000,000 per year, are now being manufactured by private firms. These factories are all under strict regulation by inspectors from the Department of Agriculture.

Tuberculosis has long been known to exist in cattle, particularly among cows and dairy herds. From the cattle it is communicated to the hogs that are feeding with them. As a result, 10 per cent of the 40,000,000 hogs slaughtered last year, valued at $1,000,000,000, were affected by tuberculosis. Two years ago the department, in connection with the States, commenced investigation and prevention work on a large scale so that last year a million and a half dollars was appropriated for this work by the Federal Government, and they were assisted by appropriations from 45 of the 48 States. It is confidently expected that within a few years as good a showing can be made in the reduction of tuberculosis in cattle and hogs as has been made in the reduction of deaths from hog cholera.

The Department of Agriculture is authorized to expend during the present and the next fiscal year, in cooperation with the highway commissions of the various States, approximating $150,000,000, aside from the unexpended balances from previous years, in building good roads throughout the country. Some six years ago a Bureau of Markets was organized in the department with an appropriation of $50,000. Its budget this year is nearly $3,000,000. It is actively studying all the more important marketing problems and is endeavoring to facilitate the distribution and handling of farm products by making promptly available accurate and dependable information regarding prices, supplies, and demands in the great city markets like New York, Boston, Chicago, and San Francisco, to which points vast amounts of fruits, vegetables, and perishable products are sent. Its leased wires, operated in connection with its market news services, carry the information to producers, dealers, and consumers in all sections of the country, bringing about the more orderly and systematic marketing of farm products. The bureau also is charged with the administration of the cotton futures act, the grain standards act, and the Federal warehouse act.

The Office of Farm Management gives attention to matters relating to the business side of farming, including cost of production, financial arrangements, organization methods, and the like. The Bureaus of Plant Industry and Entomology and the Federal Horticultural Board have rendered the greatest service in eradicating or controlling plant diseases and insect pests in this country, and also in preventing the introduction into the United States from foreign countries of new diseases and pests. A great work has been done in the South in connection with the eradication of the pink boll worm, which made its way into Texas from Mexico, and also in combating citrus canker in Florida and the other Southeastern States. In short, through its various agencies, the department is endeavoring in all feasible ways to make agriculture profitable and to improve rural life generally.

In conclusion I will be candid and say that my remarks have been prepared as much with my farmer friends in view as they have for Members of Congress who have equal facilities with myself for collecting data. Therefore I give the Government expenditures for 1915 and the estimates for 1921:

Connecticut's Interest in the Agricultural Appropriation Bill—Value of Crops for 1919—End of Technical War Earnestly Desired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 11, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, we can not be too liberal in providing funds for the work of the Department of Agriculture.

All during the great conflict the slogan, "Food will win the war" confronted us on every side; and there is no gainsaying the fact that in these uncertain times food will go a long way to beating the Bolsheviki. A good bath, a new suit of clothes, work, and a good meal will do more to make respectable and law-abiding citizens out of some of the so-called red element in the country than all the machine guns can. Just because a man wants something to eat is no reason why he should be eager to take a bite out of the Constitution.

Recently in Connecticut a number of the radicals were arrested and sent to Ellis Island for deportation.

I do not say that the connection between the work of eliminating the reds and improving agriculture is so close as to be in logical sequence, but when men see that the Government stands ready to assist the agricultural development of the country in every way they are going to inquire further into the matter, and in so doing will be impressed with the honor and dignity of honest toil.

Connecticut, even though it is not generally called an agricultural State, is intensely interested in the pending measure. Her farm products during 1919 entitle her to a hearing.

More than 55,000 acres were given over to corn in that year, and the crop of 3,300,000 bushels was valued at $5,940,000, or $108 an acre; 20,000 acres were planted with oats, and the crop was valued at $546,000; more than 11,000 acres with rye, valued at $440,000; more than 5,000 acres with buckwheat, valued at $200,000. Connecticut's potato crop for the year reached 1,680,000 bushels, valued at $3,276,000; her tame hay, harvested from 340,000 acres, was valued at $16,429,000; and her wild hay, cut from 16,000 acres, valued at $396,000. Her orchards yielded 1,572,000 barrels of apples worth $2,672,000; her peaches reached a total value of $500,000; and her pears a value of $113,000.

By far the greatest crop of the State, however, was her tobacco crop, which amounted to 39,000,000 pounds, and was valued at $18,057,000, or $722 an acre.

It is pleasing to note that the present bill makes provision for the eradication of diseases and pests of the tobacco districts, and I trust the department will continue its splendid efforts along this line.

The total value of the 13 leading crops reported from Connecticut in 1919 was $44,888,000, as compared with $37,592,000 in 1918, and as against the figures for 1909 of $22,488,000.

During the war the Board of Agriculture of the State of Connecticut, the County Bureau of Hartford County, which I have the honor to represent, and the Hartford County League, and members of the Patrons of Husbandry throughout the county cooperated in every way possible, assisted by the State and United States Food Administrations, in increasing production, in eliminatng waste, and in otherwise throwing all available resources into the scales for a speedy winning of the conflict. Since the armistice was signed, while the tension has been relaxed, the same spirit to work and labor, as contrasted with a prevalent spirit in some quarters to retire and live on Bolsheviki hopes, has characterized the work of the Hartford County farmers. They want no cure-alls, or isms, or anything else.

What they want is a recognition on the part of the Government that the war is over, a consequent reduction in war-time taxes, the elimination of war-time bureaus and committees and conferences and councils in Washington, and an early readjustment to an actual peace. The real war is over. The technical war should disappear, and Connecticut farmers think the time has come for its disappearance.

I trust the present bill will pass without further delay.

Abraham Lincoln.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEONARD S. ECHOLS,

OF WEST VIRGINIA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 12, 1920.

Mr. ECHOLS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an address delivered by Hon. WELLS GOODYKOONTZ at Harpers Ferry, W. Va., on Sunday, February 9, 1920.

The address is as follows:

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED BY HON. WELLS GOODYKOONTZ AT HARPERS FERRY, W. VA., ON SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1920.

When Judge Tracy L. Jeffords, your distinguished fellow townsman, whom I have known for years, and whose splendid reputation is as well known in southern West Virginia as it is here or in the city of Washington, came to the Chamber of the House of Representatives and on your behalf extended the invitation to visit your peaceful and restful and historical community and to deliver an address upon the life and character of Abraham Lincoln I did not hesitate to accept the invitation, and so I am here, and glad to be here for several reasons.

First, I am glad to come into the district represented by my honored colleague, Hon. GEORGE M. BOWERS, of the city of Martinsburg, whose public life has extended over a period of more than 20 years and whose present high position—he being a member of the great Committee on Ways and Means—gives him as a representative of your district a position of great power and influence in his party and in the affairs of the Nation.

Secondly, I feel that I have been more than repaid for coming here in being privileged to listen to the beautifully eloquent address delivered to-day by Dr. A. R. Snedegar, pastor of Bolivar Methodist Episcopal Church. He mentioned something that I had not before heard, namely, that the commissioners who negotiated the treaty of peace with Germany, after having considered the matter, expressly refused to allow their sessions to be opened with prayer, and he contrasted this action with that of the American patriots assembled in convention at Philadelphia for the purpose of writing a Constitution for the United States, pointing out that one of the first things done was to order that their sessions be opened and closed with prayer.

Again, I am pleased to get back on the soil of West Virginia. Some time ago while traveling on a train through Ohio I met up with a man, evidently a toiler, judging from his horny hands and his corduroy suit, who was carrying a watch charm about as large as a silver dollar, and the legend on it in large letters was "West Virginia," with the motto and seal of the State. I said to the man, "You are from West Virginia," and he replied, "Yes; and it is the best State in the Union." Beneath the jacket of that man beats a patriotic heart and one that throbs with love for his State and his country.

The anniversary of Lincoln's birthday will occur on next Thursday. That day in West Virginia has been made a public holiday. The bill that was enacted into law was introduced by a gentleman who is now one of my neighbors—Senator Henry S. White, of Matewan. Senator White is a Union veteran of the Civil War, and in military and civil life has rendered a distinguished service to the State and Nation, and is still active and healthy in mind and body.

Now, proceeding to my subject. The position that a notable man will occupy in the history of the world can not be determined until long after the career of the man has ended.

Contemporary judgment may not be sound, yet history is accurate and just and will appraise and record at its true value the character and accomplishments of the man.

The balances in which the work of the celebrity is weighed may go up and go down, but in the fullness of time they will rest and indicate with precision the measure of that man's success.

Wherefore we are told that "though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small," which is only another way of saying that remorseless time, slow and plodding though it may be, in the end will inexorably arrive at a decision invulnerable to challenge.

Now, more than five decades have passed since Lincoln met his tragic fate, and he has been the subject of a thousand books. Investigators have exhausted every available source of information that might shed light upon the origin, character, development, and performances of this most remarkable man. Historians, statesmen, biographers, essayists, orators, teachers, and debaters all over the civilized world have meditated, reflected, and discoursed about Lincoln. But the verdict of history has been returned. That verdict was arrived at in an orderly way—the evidence of living witnesses, the circumstances of the times, the declarations of men from the different walks of life, the testimony of the dead, all were heard and considered, and judgment has been pronounced and entered thereon. That judgment may be reviewed, but it will not be reversed. It is final. It is the verdict and judgment of all mankind, recorded in the history of the world, and will stand for so long as time may last.

By that judgment Lincoln has been placed upon a pedestal alongside the very greatest men of all time.

Of continental mountain ranges there are to be found, usually at great distances apart, isolated peaks that rear their lofty heads far above the general mass and the clouds and into thin ether.

And so, of the children of men, may we liken Lincoln to one of these mountain peaks, few in number, that stand pure and white, sublime and eternal.

The world has produced many men who are catalogued as great. Elbert Hubbard classified some of them as great reformers, great teachers, and the like, but excepting Jesus of Nazareth, as to whom it would be sacrilegious to place in the category of men because of His divine origin, and perhaps Washington, no greater man than Lincoln ever lived on earth.

It is not necessary to consider the much-debated question, Which was the greater, Washington or Lincoln? Washington led the forces of the Revolution to victory, helped to write the Constitution, and to organize the Government, and was our first Chief Executive, and shines in history as a star of the first magnitude. It is enough to say that all that Washington had fought for and gained—liberty, independence, and free government—all, I say all—were in imminent danger of destruction when Lincoln was called by his country to defend them. Turning the pages of history to discover the equals of Lincoln, what do we find? We find Julius Cæsar, at the head of the Roman legions, conquering a country to-day, going into winter quarters and waiting for good weather to come, in order that he might again by military force subdue some other nation, and thereby extend the boundaries of the empire and the jurisdiction of Rome, bringing home loot and men to be slaves, but sowing the seeds of disunion that eventually brought about the disruption and disintegration of a degraded empire.

There was Napoleon Bonaparte, whose star appeared in the heavens at Austerlitz and set forever at Waterloo. What did he accomplish? That he was in all human probability the greatest military genius of the world is likely true, but with the exception of some military roads and the "Code Napoleon" he left no legacy of value to posterity.

At this juncture, in order to refresh your memories, may I not call your attention to the salient facts relating to the birth, life, and death of Lincoln? I think that a brief textbook on Lincoln should be prepared and admitted as a part of free school education. The Civil War is now sufficiently in the distance to permit this to be done without the slightest opposition from any section of the country, for the people of the South have long since fully realized not only that the preservation of the Union and of free government were necessary to their happiness, but also, had Lincoln lived, many of the vicissitudes through which they passed in the dark days of the reconstruction would not have been.

Lincoln's parents, his father, Thomas, and his mother, Nancy Hanks, came from Rockingham County, Va.; their families migrated about the same time to Kentucky; they were married in the latter State; they settled on Nolins Creek, and there in a log cabin, on February 12, 1809, was born Abraham Lincoln. Poor were his parents. Wretched were their environment. The land was poor, just one little rye field. The thriftless father, who could neither read nor write, planted a few fruit trees, never paid for the land, and four years later moved over to another place on Knobs Creek; three years later, when Lincoln was 7 years of age, the father moved his family, taking with him a few pots and pans and a quantity of liquor, into Indiana, where he settled on Little Pigeon Creek in Spencer County; two years later the mother, at the age of 34, died. Speaking of her, Lincoln tenderly said, "All that I am or hope to be I owe to my mother." When 11 years of age Lincoln walked 9 miles to and from school; when he was 20 he was known as a backwoods orator. In 1830 Lincoln moved with his father, the latter having taken a second wife in the person of Sarah Bush Johnson, this time to Macon County, Ill. Lincoln on this journey drove the ox team which drew the family and its scanty possessions. The wagon wheels were without spokes, being rounded blocks of wood sawed from the trunk of a tree with a hole in the center for the axle.

When Lincoln was 21 he made a trip on a flatboat to New Orleans, and there witnessed a slave auction, which made a powerful impression upon his mind. Returning home he was chosen as captain of a company of volunteer soldiers in the Black Hawk War.

At various periods of his life Lincoln found employment as a clerk in a store, merchandising on his own account, deputy surveyor, postmaster, ferryman, flatboatman, wood chopper, mauler of rails.

On September 9, 1836, Lincoln was licensed to practice law. He read only a few books, including the Bible, Shakespeare, and Blackstone's Commentaries on the law of England. He entered politics and served for four terms, from 1834 to 1842, in the Illinois Legislature. During this time, in 1837, he located at Springfield; after going there he became involved in a newspaper controversy with Gen. James Shields and accepted a challenge to fight a duel, which was aborted at the last minute by the intervention of friends. On September 20, 1843, he formed the law partnership of Lincoln & Herndon, which continued until Lincoln's death.

In 1846 Lincoln was elected to the lower House of Congress and served for one term. While in Congress he introduced a bill to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. He did not stand for reelection to this office and resumed the practice of law at Springfield.

His father died in 1851, aged 73 years. In 1856 Lincoln became the leader in Illinois of the Republican Party. Shortly thereafter he participated in the memorable joint debates with Stephen A. Douglas in a campaign for the United States Senate, resulting in the election of Douglas. Two years later he delivered a famous address at Cooper Union, New York City.

On May 18, 1860, he was nominated for the Presidency by the Republican convention at Chicago, and on November 6 was elected, defeating John C. Breckinridge, John Bell, and Stephen A. Douglas.

On February 4, 1861, he delivered a farewell address to his neighbors at Springfield, went to Washington, and was inaugurated the sixteenth President of the United States.

On September 22, 1862, he issued his preliminary emancipation proclamation, and on January 1, 1863, the final form of that document.

On June 8, 1864, at Baltimore, he was again nominated for the Presidency and was elected, defeating George B. McClellan.

On March 4, 1865, he was inaugurated for a second term. On April 9, 1865, Gen. Lee surrendered to Gen. Grant at Appomattox, Va.

At 20 minutes past 10 on the evening of April 14, 1865, while attending a performance of "Our American Cousin" at Ford's Theater, in Washington, Lincoln was shot in the head by J. Wilkes Booth. He was carried to a house across the street, where he remained unconscious until he died the next morning at 22 minutes past 7 o'clock.

Thus briefly have I detailed in chronological order the more important events in the life of Mr. Lincoln. It now remains for me to deal in a broader way with our subject.

The first principle to be deduced—one that every school boy and girl should be impressed with—is that Lincoln succeeded in spite of every handicap; that although he came from lowly people, parents ignorant and lacking good birth; although he was a child of poverty and son of toil; although he was reared in the wilderness and on the frontier; although he was denied the benefits of even a common-school education, yet that by his own effort he went from a log cabin to the White House.

The next lesson Lincoln's life should teach the youth of the land is that it is only under a free Government, a republic, where such an opportunity exists, where birth and wealth and caste do not restrain, where every boy has an equal opportunity with every other boy to reach the very highest station in social, political, and industrial life.

The next lesson to be learned is the lesson of kindness. Gentle and courteous, considerate and sympathetic, yet withal firm, these were some of the attributes of Lincoln. Such characteristics were indicated by the following examples:

On the streets of Richmond, after the evacuation, he met an aged Negro who took off his hat; thereupon Lincoln, with equal courtesy, lifted his own hat. Upon being asked why he took off his hat to a Negro, he said he did not want a Negro to be more polite than he was.

His tender-heartedness and sympathy were shown by his firm refusal to allow the execution of the death sentence imposed by courts-martial, and by his own words—"with malice toward none, with charity for all * * *," to be found in his first inaugural.

As an evidence of his deep feeling, compassion, and sympathy for those afflicted with sorrow, permit me to read from the exquisitely beautiful letter which he wrote to Mrs. Bixby, the mother of five sons who had died on the field of battle:

I have been shown in the files of the War Department a statement of the adjutant general of Massachusetts that you are the mother of five sons who have died gloriously on the field of battle. I feel how weak and fruitless must be any word of mine which should attempt to beguile you from the grief of a loss so overwhelming. But I can not refrain from tendering you the consolation that may be found in the thanks of the Republic they died to save. I pray that our Heavenly Father may assuage the anguish of your bereavement and leave you only the cherished memory of the loved and lost and the solemn pride that must be yours to have laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom.

The next lesson is that of firmness of character.

Lincoln could never have been the great leader of men that he was had he lacked force of character. Even the gifted and polished Seward, his great Secretary of State and who at first assumed to take charge of and run the entire administration, was soon subdued and loyally followed his renowned leader. Lincoln was not a compromiser of questions affecting principles. Recognition of the Confederacy, involving disunion, was utterly abhorrent to his mind.

Lincoln had a goal, and in pressing forward to it had to deal with many impediments; these he sometimes removed, at other times he climbed over them, but if neither of these could be done he went around them; "plowed around," as he expressed it.

He had an object and to that object he went as rapidly and assiduously as circumstances and conditions would permit.

His tenacity, his unswerving determination, is exhibited in his second inaugural address, where, with almost fanatical zeal, he said:

Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled up by the bondsman's 250 years of unrequited toil shall be sunk and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said 3,000 years ago, so still it must be said "the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

I now come to the greatest element in the life and soul of Lincoln—his democracy.

Springing from the soil, he was the farthest thing in the world from an aristocrat or an autocrat; his past life, he said, quoting from Gray's Elegy, was but "the short and simple annals of the poor."

Christ was born in a manger at Bethlehem, and is described in the Bible as "A man of sorrows," and who went about doing good.

Lincoln's place of birth was no less lowly. His life was full of sorrow. He was an instrument for the accomplishment of good. When he loosened the shackles and set free millions of bondmen and gained for himself the name "The Great Emancipator," he did good, and when by the arbitrament of arms he saved from dismemberment and dissolution the union of States that had formed the Republic, founded by Washington and ruled by a democracy, he again did good.

The most perfect definition ever given of the word democracy is to be found in the brief address made by President Lincoln in dedicating the battle field at Gettysburg. As long as time shall endure the memorable words which he there uttered, remarkable for their beauty, for they were as chaste as the rhetoric of Aristotle, as they were for the profound and undying principles of government which they enunciated, will remain as an inspiration to all mankind, a never-failing spring where patriots may drink and renew their faith.

The address came at the conclusion of an oration by Edward Everett. The latter had been selected as perhaps the best qualified man in the country for such a task—highly educated, he had served as ambassador to England, Secretary of State, governor of Massachusetts, and United States Senator—he had made exhaustive preparation for the greatest effort of his life; and when he had spoken for two hours and sat down, amid great applause President Lincoln arose in response to a request from the committee to make "a few appropriate remarks" in dedicating the field to the dead.

The address had been partially written at the White House, but was not completed until he was at Gettysburg and about to start for the cemetery. The closing sentences were hastily scribbled with a pencil. The address was delivered in the presence of 100,000 people. In it he modestly declared that the world would little note nor long remember what he said. In this statement we all know how vastly mistaken he was. In concluding my remarks it is fitting that I read you the address. It is as follows:

Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that Nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battle field of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place of those who here gave their lives that that Nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But in a larger sense we can not dedicate, we can not consecrate, we can not hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us; that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth.

Diplomatic and Consular Appropriation Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. RAINEY,
OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 12, 1920.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, during the debate on the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill the following colloquy took place:

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. The gentleman from Kansas was interrogated by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] as to whether or not this rule takes into consideration the Irish question. I presume he referred to the Mason resolution. I want to know if the chairman will permit an amendment to this rule now to take into consideration the Mason resolution so that it will be brought before the membership of this House?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The matter was not incorporated in the bill by the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Rules does not take jurisdiction of legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas said that the Mason resolution on the Irish question was not incorporated in the bill by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that the Committee on Rules does not take jurisdiction of legislation. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, that this technical objection was all the sympathy that the chairman of the Rules Committee offered for the resolution in answer to my question whether he would permit an amendment to make the Mason resolution in order so that it may now be brought before the membership of the House.

Did the gentleman from Kansas, assuming his objection is valid, express one word of regret that the Mason resolution can not now be brought before the House? Did he volunteer a single suggestion as to how it could be done in the immediate future? Did he promise his cooperation to bring the Mason resolution from its present graveyard, where it is dead and buried, if the Republican steering committee of this House succeeds in keeping this resolution from coming to a vote?

The gentleman from Kansas is chairman of the important Rules Committee. The Rules Committee is in a measure subject to the Republican steering committee, that invisible committee of the Republican Party, the party that controls this House. Without the sanction of the Republican steering committee no legislation can take place in this House. The gentleman from Kansas no doubt has influence with his Republican brethern on the steering committee. If he is favorable to the resolution and wants to see it pass, his anxiety for its passage will prompt him to point out to the Republican steering committee that the House is controlled by the Republicans; that the Republicans by their failure to bring the Mason resolution before this House are laying the Republican Party open to the charge of playing politics; that the Republicans are impliedly guilty of sharp practices by deceiving the friends of Irish freedom, by pretending to be favorable to the resolution when, as a matter of fact, they are betraying the confidence of the friends of Irish freedom by allowing the Foreign Relations Committee, which is also controlled by Republicans, to pigeonhole the Mason resolution until after next election. Perhaps the Republicans to save their faces, intend to allow the resolution to come before this House so late in the session that a legislative jam will prevent a vote being taken on it, but that will not work with the friends of Irish freedom even if it saves the Republicans of this House and the Senate from going on record as to how they stand on the resolution. If the Republicans are sincere and want the Mason resolution to come to a vote, they will do it now, so that the resolution may be passed by this House and forwarded to the Senate in time to be acted upon by the Senate and become a law at this session of Congress, and not play politics until after next November.

The Republican Party, through the Committee on Foreign Affairs, permitted Bourke Cockran, Judge Cohalon, and many others interested in the Irish question to come to Washington a few weeks ago. Extensive hearings were held and the front pages of the newspapers carried "scare" headlines, stating what the Republican Party was going to do for the Irish people and the Irish cause. The truth is that the hearings, the newspaper advertisements, and everything else done by the Republican Party in connection with the Irish cause was done simply for political purposes. The Republicans are hoping and trying to induce the friends of Irish freedom to leave the Democratic Party, and the Republicans are pretending to favor the Mason resolution.

Now is the time for the Republicans to show their sincerity; now is the golden opportunity for the Republicans to translate pretense into action by bringing a resolution before this House and passing it, for the Republicans have sufficient votes in this House, and can do it. Bring a resolution before this House, and you will find the majority of the Democratic Members voting for it. The Republicans—and only the Republicans—can bring the Mason resolution before this House. The Republicans have had a majority in this House and in the Senate since May, 1919, and they can report out the Mason resolution or any other measure favorable to Irish freedom. But the Republicans have not done it and the Republicans will not do it, unless they are driven to do it by the fear that the friends of Irish freedom will remember the betrayal of the Mason resolution next November.

Why the failure of the distinguished Republican leaders and pretended friends of the Irish people in their reservations on the League of Nations to incorporate an article favorable to Irish freedom? The Republican leaders outside this House have done for the Irish what their Republican brethren in the House have, are, and will continue to do—absolutely nothing.

In a speech I made in Chicago—January, 1920—I told the friends of Irish freedom that the Democratic Party is bigger than any one man; that they should not allow their disappointment in one man to be made over into a Republican bait or snare, whereby the friends of Irish freedom will be led to vote for Republican candidates on the hollow pretense that the Republicans were going to help the cause of Irish freedom. The Republicans have not yet shown that they are ready to go as far as I, a Democratic Congressman, have pointed out as their plain duty in the matter of the Mason resolution. I do not want the friends of Irish freedom to be hoodwinked by Republican straddling, pretense, and propaganda. I want the friends of Ireland, including the millions of them in this country who have no Irish blood in their veins, together with the other millions of American men and women of Irish extraction, to know the facts about the Republican failure to act on the Mason resolution or any other matter which would be beneficial to the cause, and I confidently leave it to their good judgment to say whether the Republicans can be trusted to do any more for Ireland after next November than they have done to date.

Use of Forest Reserves.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. EVANS,
OF MONTANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 12, 1920.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH]. This identical provision, except as to amount, has been carried in this bill for years. The amendment is as follows:

For experiments and investigations of range conditions within the national forests or elsewhere on the public range, and of methods for improving the range by reseeding, regulation of grazing, and other regulations, $35,000.

If you inspect the present law you will find it a verbatim copy. This year the Secretary of Agriculture recommended $60,000 for this work, but afterwards told the committee he would get along with $35,000. The mistaken policy of false economy no doubt influenced the committee to eliminate the item entirely. Mr. Speaker, I venture there is no item in this bill where an expenditure of that amount of money will bring a better return to the Government. The trouble now is that this matter is not being considered on its merits; gentlemen who on yesterday spent the day trying to attach a rider to this appropriation bill to amend the forest reserve act and compel the Secretary of Agriculture to increase by 300 per cent the grazing fees charged for grazing in these reserves, and failing in that, attempted to put all the vacant public lands into grazing lands without success, are now trying to cripple the Forest Service by denying the necessary appropriations.

Mr. Speaker, it is to be deplored that so much bitterness has crept into this discussion. I am sure if men from the great Mississippi Valley, from Kansas, Iowa, Illinois, and other States were acquainted with the real conditions and facts, they would not suggest that we from the mountain States, where the reserves are situated, are trying to rob the Treasury. I am sure such criticisms come from a lack of information rather than a belief in the lack of integrity and fidelity of those of us who come from the public-land States.

These forest reserves are not primarily grazing reserves. The grazing is only incidental to the preservation of the forest. The reserves are supposed to be covered with timber; yet it is a fact that about two-thirds of the annual revenue derived comes from the grazing privileges. Twice as much is thus derived as comes from the sale of timber with which these great areas are supposed to be covered. Gentlemen complain that this grazing charge is not high enough. Perhaps it is not; but what investigation has been made to warrant this committee in saying it should be increased 300 per cent? The hearings reveal no testimony that warrants such a raise. The Secretary of Agriculture or any of his experts and advisers did not so testify. If the Secretary believed this service was worth any such figure, he would fix the charges accordingly; he has the power now to do so. No farmers or stockmen who use the privileges were called before the committee that their views might be obtained, so until some investigation is made this House is not warranted in imposing such a charge on the people who use these reserves. Nor should the Members of this House who come from the forest-reserve States be pilloried or charged with lack of fidelity to their country.

Failing to fasten what we believe to be an unjust burden upon the stock interests of these States, you next attempt to put 300,000,000 acres of the public domain into great grazing reserves, on the theory, as the chairman says, it will bring the Government $15,000,000. Mr. Speaker, such a proceeding would practically annul the homestead law. There is not a State west of the Ohio River that was not built up and made great under the beneficent homestead law. What the West needs and what every new country needs is settlers. We want homes and home builders; thus only can that country grow and develop. Men who live on the rich alluvial lands of the Mississippi Valley, on well-developed farms growing timothy, clover, and alfalfa, must not compare their situation or their lands and grasses to the growth on the mountainside of the Great Rocky Mountains. If the members of the Agricultural Committee will visit these States and these reserves, they will return with a broader vision on this important subject.

I am sure the $35,000 asked for in this amendment is needed, and it will be a false economy on the part of this Congress to deny it.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS L. RUBEY,
OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 4, 1920.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House, and to be used by the Members during the consideration of the Agriculture appropriation bill, I have compiled the following table. This table contains the various items for which appropriations are made. It shows for each item the amount appropriated for the current year 1920, the sum estimated for by the department, and the amount recommended by the House committee. The table also shows the increases and decreases as compared with 1920, and the increases over and the decreases under the department estimates:

Bring Home the Bodies of Our Heroic Dead.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. KING,
OF ILLINOIS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Wednesday, February 11, 1920.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, the French Government, without any serious protest on the part of American executives, has placed an embargo on the removal of American dead buried in France to their native land.

The sobs and tears of the distressed American parents are of no avail. They plead in vain and cry for mercy—for the return of all they care for on earth. But no! There is money to be made, and they are crushed in the onward rush beneath the wheels of golden chariots.

Dispatches from Paris say that French hotels are preparing for summer tourists; that hotels requisitioned for Government offices are to be returned to their owners as soon as possible, according to a decision by the French cabinet; that it is believed they will be ready to accommodate the flood of American visitors expected next summer.

These dispatches further state that there are 600 large hotels and 2,500 smaller hostelries in Paris; of the latter 1,000 being suited to the tourist trade, and hotel men believe they can handle the tide of excursionists this year and intend to open a central bureau where strangers may be directed to satisfactory quarters.

WHO ARE THESE TOURISTS?

Who are the tourists? Who are these gay excursionists? They are the sorrowing American fathers and mothers, wives and sweethearts, compelled by the exigencies of greed to make a long and expensive pilgrimage to view the sacred places where rest the expatriated dead.

Not alone are they gay in Paris over the prospect for the summer, but on this side of the ocean the canyons between the skyscrapers echo with loud hosannas. There is to be no stop in the work of gathering up any loose change the people may have left—there will be dividends for the humble and downtrodden stockholders in ships, profits for the patrioteer, and swag for the money exchange robber. Yes; there will be lots of good business this summer, because Americans will go to visit the graves of their dead in France—some in first cabins, but more in the steerage. But "there's a good time coming boys" when this great game of national body snatching will be at an end.

Mr. Speaker, the organized propaganda designed to suppress the cries of America for its dead children by misleading the people into the thought that those who prepare the dead for burial are back of this demand is a sentiment fit only to emanate from the mind of a demon.

Any Member of this House knows that the desire proceeds from the hearts of the afflicted. Here, read one letter:

BOSTON, MASS., February 9, 1920.

Congressman KING,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: My only child, Lieut. Edwin A. Daly, Company D, One hundred and sixty-fifth Regiment Infantry, was killed in action July 29, 1918. Have tried ever since to get his body home. Kindly help me get it at once. If Baker, Pershing, and the rest had kept out of it the bodies would have been home long ago. I am not interested in any honor that France can do the body of my boy. I want it at once.

Sincerely, yours,

GEORGE T. DALY.

How can anyone who is a parent read that letter and be not moved. He gave all he had to his country—his only son. Yet he is deprived of his one request, that he may have returned to him the most precious thing on earth—his son's remains. Think of it, you men who have sons! Put yourself in this father's place. How many times have you, as he has done, at close of day kissed your son good night, and in the morning hailed his bright eyes and red cheeks as the "best bet on earth." Slowly he grew to boyhood, to young manhood. Ah, how often have you seen yourself reflected in him! How often have you looked deeply into his eyes and almost seen the prolongation in him of your own life and exclaim, "This is immortality!"

And if perchance this night the little white cross over his grave glitters in the dim light of a foreign moon in a strange and far-away land, you, too, will cry out with Daly, "I want the body of my boy! I want it now!"

Uniform Clothing and Equipment.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES B. ASWELL,
OF LOUISIANA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Thursday, February 12, 1920.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, the following is the record of the fight for the legislation that gave 4,000,000 service men their uniform clothing and equipment:

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Dec. 3, 1918.]

PERSONAL EQUIPMENT, ENLISTED MEN IN ARMY AND MARINE CORPS.

"Mr. ASWELL rose.

"The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Louisiana rise?

"Mr. ASWELL. To ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

"The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to address the House not to exceed three minutes. Is there objection?

"Mr. WALSH. Well, what about, Mr. Speaker? Reserving the right to object——

"Mr. ASWELL. To make some suggestions regarding the enlisted men in the Army and Marine Corps.

"The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

"There was no objection.

"Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, in the last few days I have conferred with a number of enlisted men who are being discharged from the Army and the Marine Corps in several sections of the country, and I am impressed with the great desire on the part of these men to retain their uniforms. It will be a good investment for patriotic purposes as well as a proper and right thing to do. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Speaker's desk.

"Mr. MANN. Well, I object, not knowing what it is. That is not the way to bring it up.

"The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

"Mr. ASWELL. I would like to ask the gentleman that it be read.

"Mr. MANN. If the gentleman is going to ask unanimous consent then for its consideration, that is not fair to the House.

"Mr. ASWELL. I will ask that it be read for information.

"Mr. MANN. It is proposed then to ask for its immediate consideration?

"Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I have two minutes left, and I ask that it be read in my time.

"The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the resolution be read in his time. Is there objection?

"There was no objection.

"The Clerk read as follows:

"Joint resolution (H. J. Res. —) to dispose of the personal equipment of enlisted men in the Army and Marine Corps.

"Resolved, etc., That the personal equipment of each enlisted man in the Army and in the Marine Corps in the service of the United States on November 11, 1918, shall, upon his honorable discharge, automatically become the personal property of said enlisted man in the Army and the Marine Corps.

"Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

"Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

"Mr. DUPRÉ. Why not include men of the Navy?

"Mr. ASWELL. The personal equipment of men of the Navy already belongs to them."

I then presented the matter to the War Department and it came to the House through the Committee on Military Affairs, in bill 13366, which did not include all the articles of clothing provided in the original Aswell resolution.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Dec. 16, 1918, p. 521.]

"Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, the first day Congress proceeded to business at this session I introduced a resolution directing that the enlisted men of the Army and the Marine Corps be given their uniforms, the other departments of the Government all being included without any additional law, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] promptly objected to my resolution and prevented its consideration. I proceeded immediately to present the matter to the General Staff of the War Department, and I was requested to submit the resolution and to offer suggestions to the proposed resolution that I had introduced upon the floor of this House. I did so. I was informed that a bill would be prepared by the War College. * * *

"I merely call the attention of the House to the fact that my resolution provided that the enlisted men be permitted to keep their uniforms. It is stated in the resolution as 'personal equipment,' which means all the uniforms—their underclothes, shoes, overcoats, and hats or caps. I submit to this House that it is ridiculous and absurd for the shoes and one or two suits of underclothing to be salvaged by the War Department or destroyed when they would be of great value to these soldiers if permitted to be retained.

"Gentlemen of the House, it is absolutely absurd to talk about the top clothes and take the other suits away from these young men. I am for the bill if you do not give them anything but one shoe. I am for anything that you give these boys, but it is clear that they should have their entire personal equipment."

The bill was then amended to include the personal equipment as provided in the original Aswell resolution, passed the House December 16, 1918, and became a law February 28, 1919. All honorably discharged soldiers and marines under this legislation are entitled to receive their personal equipment.

I make this brief statement for the benefit of service men who may not have had their attention called to the matter.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ASHBROOK,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 13, 1920.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered in the Soldiers' and Sailors' Memorial Hall at Pittsburgh, Pa., last evening to the Veteran Guard of Allegheny County, Pa., by our colleague, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY JAMES O'CONNOR IN THE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' MEMORIAL HALL, PITTSBURGH, ON LINCOLN'S BIRTHDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1920, ON THE INVITATION OF THE VETERAN GUARD OF ALLEGHENY COUNTY, PA.

On February 12, 1809, Almighty God, the creator of heaven and earth, sent into this world one of His greatest children to do noble things, not dream them all day long, and so make life, death, and that vast forever one grand, sweet song. No comet appeared at his birth, there was no hurtling of battle in the air, no new light on land or sea to announce the arrival of the foremost figure of his age. The sun rose in all his glory as on billions of morns before, and set in sadness at the death of that day in the same sublime colors of a million years ago. Other children came in on that day, played their parts in the grand drama of life, and then passed over into that other country from whence no traveler ever returns. Born as the Nazarene in lowliness, but far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife, he grew up under circumstances, surroundings, and conditions that would have subdued any but a man sent into the world to perform its highest office and glorify the ideals of humanity.

Tried at once by pain, danger, obscurity, appalling poverty, sorrow and sadness, and a great grief, he meditated undisturbed by the tremendous turmoil of the times, a chapter in human affairs so holy and sublime that it would not have misbecome those ethereal virtues whom he saw throughout his Christian life flinging down upon the jasper pavements crowns of amaranth and gold at the foot of the great white throne of God. How oft this poor unknown lad must have meditated upon the lines—

Ah! How hard it is to climb the steep where fame's proud temple shines afar.
Ah! Who can tell how many a soul sublime has felt the influence of a malignant star.
Checked by the scoff of pride, by envy's frown, and poverty's unconquerable bar
In life's low vale remote has pined alone
And then dropped into the grave unpitied and unknown.

How oft that poor lad of pioneer days must have staggered at the fearful journey ahead, over which he went with malice toward none, with charity for all, and reached the summit of human greatness, glory, and grandeur. What vistas must have been opened to the gaze of the boy that read in the loneliness that would have tried any but a dauntless soul and one possessed of the divine fire again and again, the "Pilgrim's Progress," "Æsop's Fables," "Robinson Crusoe," and the "Life of Washington."

God moves in mysterious ways His wonders to perform. And whenever it is necessary in the history of the race that heroism of the highest order and virtue sublime should lead mankind out of the darkness and wilderness, he answers that cry of the soul and the man comes from a Nazareth. He comes from a mother, the world likes to forget—from a father we ignore.

Nothing is known of Shapkespeare's mother except that she bore the beautiful name of Mary Arden; nothing much is known of the mother of the great emancipator and unionist, except that which is enough to give everlasting glory to her, that she was an American girl named Nancy Hanks and was the mother of him who belongs to the ages.

Soldiers, sailors of the blue, members of the Grand Army of the Republic, my countrymen and women, I am proud of the honor of this great privilege that has been bestowed upon me, for it is the greatest distinction that can be conferred upon one to be selected as the orator on such an occasion. I shall never forget it, nor shall my children ever cease to boast of this red-letter day in their father's career. Perhaps it is appropriate that one who was born in poverty and obscurity, and who longed from his childhood days to take his place among his countrymen in the greatest Legislative Assembly in the world should be the speaker on the anniversary of him whose birth and struggles should be an inspiration to American boys and girls until the last chapter is written in our country's history, the anniversary of him whose unparalleled career shows that this is a land of opportunity for the child born in the hut as well as one born in a palace with silver spoon in his mouth and rocked in a golden cradle; and that ours is a country of men and women who enshrine in their affections the heroes and heroines who by service to humanity and love of their native land win for themselves this imperishable place in the hearts of their countrymen. The life of Abraham Lincoln is a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night to the youth of all the ages that will pass over the United States of America. It teaches the great lesson that nothing is impossible to him who will toil and moil for his country's welfare and for the vindication of the purest ideals and highest motives the great lesson that there is no royal road to glory or triumph, that by struggling for the right and an unswerving adherence to God's commands do we bring ourselves nearer to justifying our existence and nearer, nearer to the invisible choir.

I come to you, my countrymen, from New Orleans, the city that Abraham Lincoln went to in 1828 on a raft when only 19 years of age to sell the produce he brought down the Mississippi; a city he visited again on a raft of his own three years later, in 1831. How often have I pictured that poor boy standing on the river front in the city of my birth selling his produce. How often, when all the world seemed dark to me, have I thought of his wonderful rise from raft boy to the intellectual giant that won for himself forensic glory in his never-to-be-forgotten debate with Douglas, of the magic flight on wings of genius to the Presidency of the United States, and to Olympian heights of grandeur and nobility of soul in his incomparable address at Springfield, the immortal first inaugural, and the transcendent Gettysburg that will shine through the mist and clouds of the centuries to come, and the crowning glory of the English language of his second inaugural address.

What nobler utterance is to be found in sacred or profane literature, in the masterpiece of Grecian or Roman eloquence, in the ancient or modern letters and rhetoric, than these patriotic words bursting from his aching heart and throat? In his second inaugural stands out this sublime expression of American patriotism:

I am loath to close. We are not enemies. Though passion may have strained, it must not break our bonds of affection. The mystic chords of memory stretching from every battle field and patriot grave to every living hearthstone all over this broad land will yet swell the chorus of the Union when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature.

He belongs to the ages—yes, to the forevermore.

I come to you to sing a pæan of glory for our own Abraham Lincoln, for he no longer belongs to any one Commonwealth but to the Nation. I come to you from the far South, from Louisiana, the mother of States, to offer my poor tribute to the memory of the anointed—one of the exalted figures of the race—for the South is as much your native land as the North is my country. We mourned the death of Lincoln with a great grief, and our woe to-day is as your woe. It meant not only a great grief to our Southland but entailed a great suffering. For, as Jefferson Davis said, "Next to the destruction of the Confederacy, the death of Lincoln was the darkest day the South has ever known."

It was a day wet with tears and choking with heart sobs. All that a nation could murmur in its tragic sorrow was "Thine, not my will be done, O Lord."

My tears will mingle with yours at "Captain, oh, my captain!" and the recantation of London Punch. The Nation North, East, South, and West will reverence his memory until time is no more. Aye, truly, does "God move in a mysterious way His wonders to perform." The War of the Roses finally united the followers of the houses of York and Lancaster and made for a greater England. The dreadful conflict of four years and more that tried men's souls bound a Nation in fraternal ties and patriotic bonds that means the perpetuation of "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people" on the Western Continent. We of the South can never forget Lee and Stonewall Jackson and Davis and those other illustrious heroes who have gone with the conquered banner to join your heroes of the blue—Lincoln, Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, and their glorious followers who died on many a hard-fought battle field or who passed away after having served their country well. We can no more forget the survivors of the gray, whose ranks are rapidly thinning, than can your kinsmen forget you.

They fought for the right as God gave them the light to see the right. In the years to come some Walter Scott will write the romantic history and appealing story into the literary life of our country, and the heroes of the Civil War will be regarded as the heroes of a common land. You of the blue and those of the gray are one to-day, divided only as the waves but one as the sea.

Your blood and ours commingled have made for the young heroes that saved the world and its civilization when Europe was staggering to its destruction and fall.

Your daughters have married our boys and our girls have married your sons. We are one in blood, in ideals, in hopes, in patriotism, and aspirations. These lines, which found their way into millions of American hearts, shows that we are one in soul, heart, and spirit. Shoulder to shoulder and heel to heel for America, the land of our birth and our dreams, the home of our children, over which will always float the Stars and Stripes, in which will always be sung America and the Star-Spangled Banner.

Here's to the blue of the wind-swept North,
As they'll meet on the fields of France;
May the spirit of Grant be with them all
As the sons of the North advance.

And here's to the gray of the sun-kissed South
As they'll meet on the fields of France;
May the spirit of Lee be with them all
As the sons of the South advance.

And here's to the Blue and Gray as one,
As they'll meet on the fields of France;
May the spirit of God be with them all
As the sons of our flag advance.

My song hath ceased, my theme is ended, my voice will soon be but an echo. Would that my humble effort on this great day were a worthier tribute to one who has been to me the Rainbow to the storm of life

The evening beam that smiles the clouds away.

To me Abraham Lincoln stands out as one of the choice spirits of the world, a great martyr, and next to the apostles of Jesus Christ as a man of sorrow, one who lived to bless mankind. All of the great warriors and conquerors of the earth that fought for the enslavement of man and their own military glory, who waded through slaughter and shut the gates of mercy on mankind, will pass away and be forgotten. But Lincoln will live on forever, his fame undimmed by age, his careworn face and creed the dream of numbered millions, "as the sands of the sea," who will go through life inspired by his fortitude, his humbleness of heart and spirit, in adversity and prosperity, in disaster and in triumph, in defeat and victory. For he stands out, high above this host of spear and blood, a great lighthouse by which his storm-tossed countrymen will steer the ship of state on the nights when we may pray for that kindly light to lead us on o'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent until the night is gone and with the morn those angel faces smile which we have long loved and lost awhile.

In a few years more, ye men of the blue, your spirits will be with that ever venerated shade. Again you will meet the boys of the gray, not in combat, but as brothers that were estranged, and there will be the great joy of a happy reconciliation—there you will meet those gallant souls who fought the good fight on land and sea for their native land, because it was their own and scorned to give aught other reason why. Then it will be to those that are left behind to remember the past with its heartache, its trials and its suffering, and the great joy that resulted from a reunited country; that you are with the mighty souls of the ages that have joined the scroll of eternity. Then it will be for us and our children to remember you as we remember your comrades who have answered the great command, the final order to "fall in."

The muffled drum's sad roll has beat
The soldier's last tattoo;
No more on life's parade shall meet
That brave and daring few.
On fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.

Their shivered swords are red with rust;
Their plumed heads are bowed;
Their haughty banner, trailed in dust,
Is now their martial shroud;
And plenteous tears have washed
The red stains from each brow;
And their proud forms in battle gashed
Are free from anguish now.

Rest on, embalmed and sainted dead,
Dear as the blood you gave;
No impious footsteps here shall tread
The herbage of your grave;
Nor shall your glory be forgot
While fame her record keeps,
Or honor points the hallowed spot
Where valor proudly sleeps.

Centuries will roll their way into eternity. Generation after generation of Americans will come and go. But each and every generation, through numberless years will dwell upon your virtues and your patriotism all over this broad land, and on Lincoln's birthday and the other great days in our history when they will assemble as Americans to listen reverently and proudly to their countrymen's achievements orators on the Atlantic and Pacific, on the Lakes and the Gulf coasts will proudly look back to the days of the great conflict as days that showed that the North and the South were the homes and the firesides of brave and chivalrous men, heroes all, of gentle, God fearing, noble, and dauntless women, heroines all.

Methinks I can hear from my land of dreams these future speakers of America's thought, hope, and patriotism declare, as they point to the monuments that will rise up all over our splendid country to commemorate the valor of Americans on the battle field and their dauntless heroism on sea:

Yon marble minstrel's voiceless tone
In deathless songs shall tell,
When many a vanquished age hath flown,
The story how ye fell.
Nor wreck, nor change, nor winter's blight,
Nor Time's remorseless doom,
Shall dim one ray of holy light
That gilds your glorious tomb.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN JACOB ROGERS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 12, 1920.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with leave granted me, I am herewith inserting in the RECORD the speech of Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT on the Problems of the Day, delivered at Springfield, Mass., last Sunday, as follows:

SPEECH OF HON. FREDERICK H. GILLETT AT SPRINGFIELD, FEBRUARY 8, 1920.

This is one of the most critical times in the whole history of our country, and, indeed, of the world. A man must be very self-confident who holds important office and does not feel oppressed by the tremendous responsibility. A year ago we were all rejoicing in the return of peace, and we looked forward to resuming speedily the comfortable and progressive life which seemed lying plain before our country. But I think few reckoned on the depth and breadth of the effects of the terrific convulsion which had shaken us. We knew that the war had taken away from our industries several millions of the flower of our youth, that it had diverted production into new lines which would have to be abandoned when peace came, that it had tremendously stimulated some industries and had annihilated others, but I do not think anyone appreciated the relaxation and demoralization which would ensue when the spirit of patriotism, which the war kindled and which had inspired the country to endure without grumbling all kinds of privations, lost its ardor with the return of peace. Then the abnormal conditions and privations which we had borne willingly when we thought they were helping our brave soldiers who had subjected themselves to so much more terrible ordeals became subjects of criticism and indignation. And there have followed a restlessness and discontent which have seemed to invade every kind of occupation and have seriously impaired our efficiency and our production.

What is true in America seems to be true in a far greater degree in Europe, and conditions there, as I see them, are utterly appalling.

Of Russia we know little that is authentic, but apparently that enormous country is in the throes of civil war, with no government except a military despotism, and with its whole industrial organization and transportation system demoralized if not ruined. Elsewhere we see new republics organized with new boundaries where the people have had no experience in self-government, and with jealous and hostile neighbors causing a constant state of insecurity and uneasiness.

Over all of them hovers the dread, if not the actual pressure, of hunger and want, and some of them are faced with the peril of immediate starvation. In nearly all of them the financial condition, the soundness of which is a prerequisite for any permanent prosperity, seems hopeless. We have learned to look upon the people of Germany as conspicuous examples of that orderly and organizing spirit which would revive most quickly from the exhaustion of war. To-day their mark, which normally is worth 24 cents, is worth but 1 cent. There is a domestic debt of $6,000,000,000. By the terms of the treaty they must pay the victors $5,000,000,000 in the next 18 months, and at the same time there have been taken away from them their colonies, their merchant ships, and a large part of their railroad equipment. And yet to start once more the great industries on which their prosperity was founded they must buy from the rest of the world quantities of raw materials in order even to begin production. How can they procure it? What can they offer as security? Who will trust them when the mark is worth but 1 cent? Yet, unless in some way this is accomplished, Germany must relapse into helplessness and penury.

The condition of Austria is far worse. I am not making these suggestions to excite sympathy for our enemies, who certainly brought their woes on their own heads and whose punishment can not be heavier than they deserve; but I am trying to point out to you the state of Europe as it affects us and our trade.

Look at France. There the franc, which was worth in normal times 20 cents, is now worth but 8 cents. During the war France suffered unutterably, and her courage and fortitude have won universal admiration. But perhaps the problems of peace will test her courage as much as those of war. Her national expenses and the burden of debt are enormous, and yet to-day, more than a year after the war ended, she is paying her running expenses, not by tax levies but very largely by borrowing. Last year her expenditures were over 32,000,000,000 of francs, while her income from taxes was only 11,000,000,000. The Government apparently does not dare to impose the necessary taxes. The people seem to hope that the indemnity paid by Germany will supply the deficiencies. I fear that is a delusive hope, as it will be impossible to collect it from Germany, and that there is a terrible crisis impending.

The condition of Italy is no better. It seems to me England is the only European Nation whose fiscal system is not pointing to national bankruptcy. The only means of salvation which I can see for these countries is to levy a substantial capital tax; that is, to confiscate a good part of every man's property to the State. That is a fearful remedy, a last resort—it is not permitted by our Constitution—and it will require stern courage and patriotism to make it succeed. Europe faces us torn by internal strife and international hate, desperate, pleading, starving.

And in considering how Europe is to recover her former condition in the business and trade of the world we must not forget that most of the nations there were unable for many years before the war to produce their own food. They became factories and workshops with the products of which they paid America for the enormous quantities of foodstuffs on which they lived. Now, with their factory life disorganized and ruined, how can they procure and pay for their necessary sustenance? Germany before the war imported each year over $350,000,000 more than she exported. She could afford this because by her shipping and her foreign investments she earned enough to make good the balance. But stripped of these by the treaty of peace how can she meet the adverse balance of trade? France to-day is importing in a year over three hundred millions more than she exports. With what can she pay this deficit, particularly when the best customer for her wines has by constitutional amendment signed the pledge? The United States, on the contrary, is exporting now $4,000,000,000 more than she imports. A large share of this goes to Europe. How can Europe pay for it? How can we collect the debt? And is the apparent marvelous balance in our favor stable or will it involve us in new obligations and dangers? We should not plume ourselves too much on this large balance, for the very fact that most of the exports go to Europe, which in normal times is our trade rival, proves that the condition is but temporary and due to the destruction and exhaustion of Europe by the war, and the very expansion which such an abnormal condition excites has its danger. How much firmer would be our status if we had developed some of this enormous export to South America.

In considering the economic policy of the United States we should bear in mind that we have loaned to European governments ten billions of dollars. To repay it at present is, for them, quite impossible, I believe, and I do not think we can reckon on any income from that debt for some time. England, to be sure is solvent, and our loans to her amount to $4,000,000,000. But she in turn has loaned to France, Russia, Italy, and Belgium twice as much as that. They can not pay her, and until she can collect the eight billions which she lent to our allies for the great cause she will doubtless urge us to relieve her of the payment of the four billions which we advanced to her for the same cause.

Compared with Europe, we are prosperous, abounding in wealth and comfort, and as we contemplate the fallen monarchs and ruined dynasties which only six years ago looked so powerful and enduring it brings to mind the graphic simile used by Fisher Ames 100 years ago: "A monarchy is a man of war, stanch, iron ribbed, resistless under full sail, but a single hidden rock can bring her to the bottom. A republic is a raft, hard to steer, your feet always wet, but nothing can sink her."

And so to-day, while we naturally grumble over our wet feet, while we sometimes wonder whether we are keeping our raft on the right tack, let us cheer ourselves with the confidence that she will not sink and brace ourselves to keep her on the true course; and as we survey the horrors of Europe congratulate ourselves on our present comparative happiness and try to make it greater and enduring. To accomplish that will be some strain on our effort and our self-control.

There is much in our condition to excite present discontent and forebodings for the future. First is our financial status. We issued during two years $21,000,000,000 of bonds and $4,000,000,000 of Treasury certificates. Before the war such an amount was unheard of and unbelievable. We borrowed it, practically all, right here from our own people. The interest on that debt is over a billion dollars a year; and while ten billions of it was loaned to foreign Governments, yet I think it will be long before they will be able to pay even any interest on it. That our people have voluntarily and cheerfully loaned these enormous sums to their Government is a magnificent tribute to their loyalty and patriotism. They could not have done it as an investment. Nothing could have brought forth from the savings and resources of the American people such a prodigious contribution except the ardent patriotism which stirred them to their depths, and of which this was only one of many demonstrations.

But those loans seriously affected our financial and economic status. There has resulted an inflation which has upset normal values, enormously increased prices, and greatly changed economic conditions. We all feel it in our daily life. One manifestation of it, which we speak of and suffer from constantly, we call the high cost of living. The burden of it is undeniable and its inequalities exasperating, and when we see the profiteering that has taken place, particularly by war contractors, while all the rest of us are contributing more than we can afford to the war expenses and bonds, it is hard to keep our indignation within bounds. But that is only one of the evidences of the inflation and economic disturbance which is the root of our present troubles. We all want to see the profiteers punished; and yet, although that would be grateful to our feelings, it would be insignificant in its effect on our condition.

The greatest sufferers, I think, are not those who cry the loudest, but are the men and women on moderate salaries—clergymen, teachers, clerks—who can not readily shift their occupation, and yet whose salaries change slowly.

The war upset the whole system of supply and demand on which our business life was founded. The sudden withdrawal into the Army of millions of our most efficient workers, the sudden demand for war supplies, and the creation of new industries entirely overturned existing conditions. What is known as the "cost-plus" contract, where the Government paid the contractor all his expenses and then a certain percentage of profit upon them, was a direct inducement to every unscrupulous contractor to increase the cost and thereby increase his profit. And yet, with the uncertainty as to costs, with the constantly rising market, it would have been difficult, if not impossible, for the Government to make contracts in the ordinary way. Therefore it was necessary under the abnormal conditions for the Government to interfere directly and no longer allow the old law of supply and demand, under which our prosperity had been built, to govern.

In Washington over 100,000 new Government employees were suddenly summoned into the city. That caused such a demand for lodgings that, under the old rule of supply and demand, those who were fortunate enough to have a supply of vacant rooms could demand almost any price, and so the Government was obliged to interpose and put a restriction upon rents.

There came a world demand for wheat, which far outran supply, and if left to the old rule the wheat farmers could have demanded almost any price. And so there, too, the Government interposed, and by purchasing the whole supply limited the price. The same was true as to labor. There was such an extraordinary demand for war production, and such a sudden diminution of the supply, that there, too, almost any price could be demanded. And so when a combination of labor threatened to stop production of our coal mines and the operation of our railroads, two of the great factors on which the industrial life of this Nation absolutely depended, the Government again was obliged to interpose.

We have become accustomed in the days of war to a new exercise of Government activity and a new interference with that system of individualism which has been the mainspring of our marvelous development. And side by side with this has grown up a movement which if not checked will prove fatal, I think, to our prosperity. I refer to the agitation and propaganda which, under various names and with more or less directness, all aim at the overthrow of our present form of government and tenure of property, and would set up in its place paternalism and communism. That, to my mind, is an issue which we can not ignore and which our economic condition makes particularly dangerous just now, because we have become somewhat used to Government intervention, we are oppressed by the fearful burdens of the war and by an abnormal weight of taxation, and by a vast debt, and expansion of credits, which hover like a cloud over us, with a constant menace of breaking into a deluge of panic and ruin.

Such conditions make the country a fertile soil for the seeds of any doctrines which promise alleviation. And so we have been deluged with suggestions and theories, barren, I believe, without any germinant principle of healthy growth and development, but heralded with unlimited promises and appealing to discontent and hope rather than to reason. Legislation is claimed to be a panacea for ills which nothing but individual effort and industry can cure, and you are taught to demand assistance and support from the National Government as a substitute for your own work and production, which is the only permanent foundation of prosperity.

And, taking its inspiration and perhaps some of its financial support from the revolution in Russia, there is an organized movement, sometimes open and avowed, sometimes subtle and indirect, aiming at a radical change in our form of government and the overthrow of the fundamental system of private ownership of property. The foreigners who are planning and directing this movement appeal especially to wage earners and coat their doctrine with attractive accompaniments. To those suffering under present conditions, as almost everyone is, any such change is momentarily alluring. To the poor it sounds good to say, "Take away the property of the rich and divide it among yourselves." That argument has been made for thousands of years and has always been appealing. But who would benefit by such a revolution? I need not point to Russia or to all the failures of this attempt in history. It is enough to appeal to common sense. If you throw it all into a common pool, the immediate beneficiaries will be the shiftless, the lazy, the frazzled edge of humanity, who try to live on others without producing themselves; and even they will not long benefit, for their new masters and their own incompetence will soon reduce them to their level. There are, of course, many unfortunates who by no fault of their own have fallen far behind in the race of life, but the vast majority in our country have the hope and reasonable expectation of themselves becoming owners of property which they and their children may enjoy and enlarge. Never in all history has there been a place or a time when a man of intelligence and industry could be so secure of comfort and independence as in our beloved country. And the temporary instability of our finances, our industry, and our prices ought not to shake our faith that this will still be the land of promise and of realization. And these ideals of communism which have been attractive in theory and fatal in practice all through history ought not to appeal to our hard-headed countrymen even though at moments conditions seem unendurable and any desperate remedy seems attractive. It was tried here in Massachusetts, and if ever it could have succeeded it was then, but its failure was absolute.

If communism failed in that small, intimate, conscientious, and industrious community could it ever succeed in our great Nation? Lincoln with his marvelous prescience compactly illustrated the argument. He said: "Let not him who is houseless pull down the house of another, but let him work diligently and build one for himself, thus by example assuring that his own shall be safe from violence when built." And yet that is the one most alluring appeal which is now being made to the discontent and restlessness caused by the upheaval of the war. That appeal we must meet by argument. In this free Republic it is by the compulsion of reason, and not of force, that doctrines must prevail. Socialism, communism, bolshevism, so long as it endeavors to change our form of government by the peaceful means provided in the Constitution and does not resort to force and violence, has a right to be heard. It is by meeting its arguments in fair debate, and not by suppression, that it will be defeated. It is only when its advocates urge revolution, the overthrow of our Government by violence and not by ballots, that the strong hand should suppress them.

In that connection I would like to say a word about the action of Congress in expelling Victor Berger, because it has been much misunderstood and his friends charge that he was unseated by force and without argument. Berger was excluded not because he was a Socialist, but purely because he had been disloyal to his country. He had been indicted, tried, convicted, and sentenced in the court of the United States. A congressional committee went over the same evidence for months, gave him every opportunity to be heard, and finally came to the same conclusion as the jury, and reported to Congress that he was guilty, and by a vote of 311 to 1 the report of the committee was approved and he was excluded from the House. He was treated not only with fairness but with generosity. All the witnesses he desired were heard and every argument presented. During nine months, although he was not a Member of the House, he was permitted to draw his salary and clerk hire, amounting to over $7,000, and was given a room as if he had been a Member. After his rejection his district again elected him, and upon his return to Washington, after an absence of only two months, he was immediately rejected again by the House by a vote of 330 to 6. His friends claim that this was not giving him a fair trial and that if his constituency wished to be represented by a traitor they had that right.

But there is a phase of the question to which they never allude and which I think is not generally understood, and upon which the second speedy action of Congress was based. The United States Constitution provides that if a man has once taken the oath as a Member of Congress and thereafter gives aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States, he is ineligible for reelection and can never again take his seat until Congress by a two-thirds vote removes his disability. Berger had been a Member of Congress several years ago and had taken the oath of office. Accordingly, when during the late war he gave aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States he brought himself within that provision of the Constitution and was ineligible to office. So when he presented himself the second time the House needed no new evidence or hearing, but in conformity with its former action voted that he was ineligible and excluded him. With a few exceptions a district can elect anyone it pleases to Congress, and Congress will recognize its choice. But under the Constitution it can not elect an alien or a man under 25 years of age, or a man who is not an inhabitant of that State, or a man who having once taken the oath of office gives aid and comfort to the enemy. Berger was just as much ineligible and his district in Wisconsin had no more right to elect him than if he had been an alien, a boy of 15, or an inhabitant of Massachusetts. He was not rejected, as their propaganda tries to show, because he was a Socialist or because he was a German by birth or by sympathy, but he was excluded for the sole reason that he, a former Member of Congress, had given aid and comfort to the enemy, and therefore under the Constitution was ineligible.

I do not think we should exclude a man for opinions or political beliefs. The way to combat opinions is by argument and logic, not by suppression. Freedom of speech is one of the inalienable rights of American citizenship, and I would rather err by giving too broad rather than too narrow scope to the freedom of speech and freedom of the press. There is only one kind of argument that I think should be suppressed, and that is argument in favor of violence. One of the chief distinctions of our Constitution is that it provides for its change and amendment by peaceful methods so that it can always be kept modern, and as long as men wish to change it and confine themselves to those methods, they are within their rights and ought not to be interfered with. We do not wish to imitate the course of Russia, the only country where Berger's socialistic theories are now in full force, and where, if he should endeavor by peaceful argument to favor a change of government he would be shot offhand without a trial. Here we make no war on free speech, but when men, either citizens or aliens, try to take advantage of the generosity and forbearance of this Republic and advocate its overthrow by force and violence, then, in my opinion, the stern arm of the law should be put forth unsparingly, and they should be deported or imprisoned.

And it is peculiarly exasperating that nearly all of these radical agitators are aliens or of foreign birth, who have come to this free country to escape restrictions of their own, and to enjoy the splendid opportunities we offer, and who repay our hospitality by trying to undermine the very form of government which attracted and protected them. They have become dissatisfied with mere liberty and now want license, and no longer are content with work and high wages, but want your property. They add ingratitude to their other crimes and when convicted I would not spare them.

There is one source of discontent which is always with us, and I suspect always will be with every government as long as man earns his bread by the sweat of his brow, and that is the conflict between employers and employed. My sympathies, as those of most men, naturally go with the employed, with the under dog, with those who in the struggle of life have had the least success, and who, as a rule, get less than their share of the product of their toil. I always hope instinctively that those striking for higher wages will win, but the subject just now is too important and too vital to our industrial life to be decided by sympathy. A generation ago the employers had the upper hand, and it was against their power and oppression that the State needed to interfere. Corporations had combined into trusts, which had become monopolies so strong that the Federal Government felt bound to interfere and by legislation to break their power and divide them into less formidable fractions. To-day we have another problem. It is a question whether the combinations of the employed are not more threatening to our business life than of the employers. I am a believer in labor unions. I think they are essential to protect the men from the overreaching avarice of their employers. They have accomplished a vast amount of good in improving working conditions and wages and self-respect. But when they go so far as to threaten, for their own advancement, to stop the wheels of the railroads and close the output of the mines, without which our whole industrial organization would collapse, they, in their turn, are exercising a power which no government can safely permit. For the pressure such a strike would exert would be so great that no matter what their demands, they must be granted, and the State can not allow any organization or class to be the dictator of the terms upon which the people may live. The sympathy which the public, because of the tyranny of the great corporations, has given to the labor unions is liable to turn to hostility if they, in the pride of power, exhibit the same selfish indifference to the public interest. The complex conditions of our life and the great extension of labor organizations have brought about a condition whose dangers everyone ought to admit and which ought to be discussed rationally, temperately, and with a view to the advantage of no class but of all the people. That is one of our vital domestic problems. The crises it precipitates are all so sudden and accompanied by so much heat and temper that a fair decision at the time by the parties involved is almost impossible. The law must provide against any sudden outbreak so that there shall always be time for passions to be allayed, the class spirit moderated, and the good of the public as well as those immediately interested be considered. For nine months Congress has been wrestling with our intricate railroad problem. The conferees appointed by the Senate and House have just reached an agreement, and I believe their settlement will be approved by both Houses of Congress. Probably no one is entirely satisfied with it. But it provides elaborate machinery for settling all labor disputes, ending with a board of appeals, where the representatives of the general public control, and I hope in practice it will accomplish the results at which its authors aim.

The shortening of the hours of labor has been one of the glories of the labor unions, and yet even that most laudable purpose can run too far. To-day the one exhortation the American people need is work. And while I would not urge any permanent abandonment by labor of its ideal of constantly lessening hours, yet to-day the laboring man and every other man as he sees the world short of everything which man produces ought to say, "It is no time for leisure or for laziness or for complaining of long hours. What the world needs is production." A part of Europe is starving. All of Europe lacks some essentials and even in the United States—which compared with the rest of the world is a Garden of Eden—even here, unless our people abandon their ease, their reluctance to labor, their readiness to strike or to profiteer, we are likely to have panic and disaster. Our National Treasury is in a precarious condition. Besides the funded debt of twenty-one billion, there is a floating debt represented by Treasury certificates of about four billions. That is not only a huge sum for the United States to carry as a temporary debt, but it is a menace to the country's financial health. We can not safely issue any more bonds. It was with great difficulty that the Victory loan was floated. And I may say here that we can not be too grateful to Gen. Pershing and his associates who determined that the war could be ended in the fall of 1918, and abandoned the first plan of not finishing it until the summer of 1919, for that would probably have been not only more expensive in lives but would have overtaxed and wrecked our finances.

This floating indebtedness of four billions can only be paid by the excess of our revenues over our expenses, and it must be paid soon and steadily. It can not safely run indefinitely. But for the next fiscal year commencing July, 1920, the Treasury estimates that the expenses of the Government will be five and a half billions and the revenues will be six billions. How, then, are we going to extinguish that debt so that our financial status will be sound? We can not well increase our revenues. Already the income taxes are so great that it is a question whether they do not really, in some instances, cost more than they return. It is not simply a question of taking more from the rich individual or the rich corporations, as sounds so easy, but it is in so taking as not to drive them into investments which will dry up our greatest sources of revenue. Experts say we have reached that limit. There is only one way of increasing our net revenue, and that is by remorselessly cutting down expenses. It is a disagreeable, unpopular, repulsive task. There are so many avenues opening out where money could be usefully spent, and the country seems so rich that no one likes to apply the pruning knife.

Right here in Springfield is a specimen of the difficulty. Our post office is utterly inadequate for its business. What is perhaps more apparent to you all, the railroad station, which has been a Government building, is just as inadequate. Many other places in the country claim to be suffering equally. But we can do business, however unsatisfactorily, as we are, and I am obliged to approve the decision of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that until our revenues can absorb our dangerous floating debt we must cut to the bone—seem parsimonious and mean and postpone new buildings. That is the only escape from financial and industrial disaster.

And what is wise for the Government is wise, too, for the individual. Economy, saving, even parsimony, is the duty of every patriotic citizen. The twenty-one billions of bonds issued in two years was far beyond the savings power of the people. It was taken up only by a patriotic appeal. It now gorges our banks and threatens our financial stability. Until the legitimate savings can absorb it our solvency is in danger. Therefore thrift, saving, is a duty of the hour. Extravagance and luxury and useless consumption are a crime when the world is stripped of goods and needs to conserve every article. And above all we need work, production. That is the one great cure for the world's present poverty, and yet that is what people all over the world seem least willing to undertake. The reaction from the war seems to have caused a general relaxation of effort.

In this country, although there has been crying need of labor in every line, with high wages, I doubt if there has ever been more voluntary idleness. I often wonder if the nefarious propaganda of the Bolshevist, trying to do us damage, has not occasioned much of it. It seems to me every one ought to recognize that this is no year to be idle except from imperative necessity. A part of the world is starving and cries "Produce." We are more fortunate; but though our necessity is not so extreme, yet we, too, are urged by motives of self-interest and self-protection, by the danger of inflation and panic and disaster, to produce and to save. "Work and save" should be the maxim of every individual. Extravagance and luxury and waste should have the condemnation of every thoughtful man. Our municipalities and our States, as well as our Nation, should curtail expense, and for another year at least "Work and save" should be our national maxim.

I am sorry to bring before you such an appeal. It would have been easier and pleasanter to have talked to you on less serious topics and avoided what I think are the vital realities of the day. But I thought here, with my constituents and friends, it was my duty to point out the dangers which threaten.

I hope I am mistaken and that no such ominous cloud as I imagine darkens the world. When you see such evidences of wealth and prosperity on every hand you may think I am a pessimist. But it is easy for any speculator to get rich when prices are going up. Every merchant and trader makes a profit as long as commodities in his hands increase in value. All then looks prosperous. But it is when the fall in prices sets in that danger lurks. Contraction must follow the war's expansion if the body politic is to regain normal health. We want that contraction to be gradual and not come in a crash, as in 1893. If we systematically work and produce and save, the process may be easy and we may reach safety without acute suffering. But if we are reckless and extravagant and idle disaster must ensue. Our industrial system is so complex that in times of inflation one single failure may precipitate a panic and like a house of cards the whole structure which seemed so strong may fall in ruins. Then follow collapse of prices, unemployment, and misery. And then will be the halcyon time for the Bolshevist. Then men's minds, discontented with the present, discouraged for the future, will be open to any new doctrines promising relief.

But even in that event, which I trust may never happen, I am not fearful of the result. Our form of government has endeared itself too much to the American citizen to be held responsible for misfortunes which may befall him now. Under it and through the system of individual enterprise which it has encouraged, there has developed on this continent an industrial system which in its wealth, its energy, and the spread of universal comfort has far surpassed any civilization our world has ever witnessed. And its most striking and glorious feature is that it has reached down and given to the poor man more independence, comforts, and possibilities than have ever been known before. We have indeed still our slums to disgrace us, and it is there that the spirit of bolshevism finds its congenial home and festers, but we are restricting and curing these sore spots, and every young and intelligent and industrious man to-day has no limit to his future. It has been the poor boys who have become our great men. Here in Massachusetts particularly, a population noted for its thrift and industry will listen to no siren song of giving up what they have in hopes of getting more by dividing with others, and here in the Connecticut Valley, the home of the skilled mechanic, who for three generations has been the backbone of our citizenship, and whose ingenuity and intelligence has made this city of homes famous and kept its government pure; here I feel confident that the constitutional system under which we have prospered will never be forsaken, and the admonition to work and save, which our fathers have both preached and practiced for generations, will not be abandoned now when it is most needed.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following:

SPEECH OF HON. GEORGE HUDDLESTON, OF ALABAMA, BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY ON FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1920.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, my views on the policy of legislation such as that which is proposed are pretty well known to you, I suppose, and I do not wish to discuss that feature of the matter.

This committee is composed wholly of lawyers, and I address myself as a lawyer to lawyers.

My purpose is not to instruct you—that would be presumptuous—but to endeavor to sharpen criticism of the measures proposed, particularly the Davey bill, by pointing out some features of it and urging on the members of the committee that they examine its details with the greatest care.

BROAD TWILIGHT ZONE BETWEEN GUILT AND INNOCENCE.

The great difficulty in legislation of this kind lies in the form and terminology in which it must be couched. It is exceedingly difficult to draft a bill on a subject of this kind. It is difficult, primarily, just as it is in all cases where new crimes are created, because of the deficiency in accurate and well-defined terminology—in the room for doubt which may exist about the meaning of the words that may be used.

It is peculiarly difficult to draft a bill to deal with a subject of this kind, because of the inherent nature of the subject. There is, of necessity, in offenses of the kind created by these bills, a broad twilight zone between guilt, absolute and undoubted, and unquestionable innocence. That is true, first, because much of the guilt is partial and much of the innocence is partial. Few men are utterly and wholly disloyal and unpatriotic. And few, on the other hand, do not occasionally entertain some thoughts that the man whose patriotism "leans always to virtue's side" might not consider unpatriotic. Hence, of necessity, such a bill must denounce as criminal men who in their hearts are innocent; and it must result in the acquittal of others who in their souls are guilty.

NEED FOR EXTRAORDINARY CAUTION.

Now, that is a difficulty that you have at the outset; and for that reason it is of the very highest importance that, conceding that the principle back of this bill and the policy which it speaks are proper and correct, extraordinary care—care which reaches the extreme verge of legislative caution—should be used in framing the language of the bill and in criticizing every phrase in it before it is put out.

The first thing that must be done is to find out what kind of crime or offense or act or speech we are aiming at; and we must settle that definitely and clearly in our minds before trying to draw a law.

Is it the purpose of the legislation that the committee has in mind, or would approve, to make "direct action" unlawful—direct action, which includes the strike, either general or local, for the purpose of influencing political action or the performance by public officials of their duties? Does the committee think well of making a criminal out of any man who says, "I do not like the law that has been passed, and therefore I will not work until that law is repealed"? Is it the purpose to go after a conspiracy to strike for consideration of that kind? Now, that is up to the committee to decide at the outset.

Mr. GARD. Well, I think right there you can be assured that there is no desire on the part of the committee, so far as I have ever heard, to intrude the provisions of this bill into any questions of the right to labor, or the right to strike, or the right of voluntary labor, or the right of cessation from labor. The whole thing that the committee has had under consideration, so far as I am advised, is the desire to place legislation upon the statute books to correct any omission in the present statute which would safeguard the Government of the United States of America from attack by physical force and violence.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That I have heard stated before, and I am happy to believe that the committee will not tolerate any such measure. But it is of the very highest importance that the committee approve no measure which could be so construed.

WHAT IS "DIRECT ACTION"?

Many people do not know what "direct action" is. They think it means taking up arms against the Government or using the bomb, or something of that kind. Well, direct action in the sense I now use it, and in the sense in which it is usually used in such radical propaganda as I have seen, means any strike for political purposes. It does not include physical force or violence against persons.

Mr. IGOE. This committee has been informed, if you will pardon me, and I think the Secretary of Labor held in that recent deportation case, that direct action—certainly in that case—meant something else besides peaceful action.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. In the manifesto of one of the communist parties—I do not remember whether it was the Communist Party of America or the Communist Labor Party of America—there occurs equivocal language in connection with the use of the term "direct action," which the Secretary of Labor has held to mean the advocacy of physical force against the Government. Just what that whole connection is I do not now recollect.

Mr. IGOE. I do not think it was based upon the words "direct action," but it was based upon the use of those words in connection with other expressions in their documents, which——

Mr. HUDDLESTON (interposing). Yes; and I think also the words "mass action" were used.

Mr. IGOE. Yes; those two expressions, "mass action" and "direct action."

BILL AIMED AT LABOR DISPUTES.

Mr. CLASSON. I just want to ask you if you find in any of the bills that are being or have been considered by this committee anything to indicate that there was any attempt to procure a law against strikes of labor?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes; the bills are full of stuff which might be so interpreted. I fancy their authors did not have that in mind.

Mr. CLASSON. Certainly not.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. And that is one cause of my appearing before the committee, to urge the committee that they have that in mind.

Mr. IGOE. If you will pardon me, I can say this: That in all the meetings that we have had, executive and otherwise, it has been stated time and time again, in express terms, by the members that they wanted to confine it to physical force and violence.

The CHAIRMAN. As a means of overthrowing the Government.

Mr. IGOE. As a means of overthrowing the Government; and they have repeatedly tried to put that in language, and, undoubtedly, as I find in going over some of these sections, some times in repeating language they have omitted clauses that ought to have been put in.

POORLY DRAWN BILLS.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I hope the committee will understand that there is no implied criticism of the committee in what I say. These bills are very poorly drawn, every one that I have seen that is before the committee, and ought not to be reported out by the committee without very careful scrutiny.

Now, to go further with my train of thought, if the committee intends to punish "syndicalism" and "sabotage," that is one thing. If you do not, that is quite a different thing. If you do not intend to punish acts which may be so classed, it is of the very highest importance that you should not allow anything to remain in this bill that could be construed as making it a crime to commit an injury to property, done under circumstances which might properly be defined as sabotage or syndicalism.

Now, I come to this conclusion: That it is the sole purpose of the committee, and the only scope that such legislation should have, to address itself against the mere advocacy of the use of physical force to overthrow the Government.

In my view we have no law which now makes that unlawful. The mere expression of the opinion or desire of an individual that physical force should be used to overthrow the Government is not a crime now. But if it is attended with any result whatsoever it becomes a crime.

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). I think you go too far there.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Well, I am merely expressing my own opinion; I do not question that you have good grounds for your opinion; I am merely trying to state mine.

There is no law, in my opinion, against a man advocating the use of physical force to overthrow the Government if it is attended with no results. If it is attended with results, it is a crime, either as an incitation to insurrection under section 4 or as a conspiracy under section 6 of the Criminal Code. If anything should result from a speaker's words, then it is a crime.

The only kind of a case that needs to be reached by law—if any kind needs to be reached—is that of the man who speaks and nothing at all results from his speech. I hope the members of the committee will consider that thought carefully, and will consider section 6 of the Criminal Code, and the scope of its operation, with great care.

EXISTING LAWS ARE AMPLE.

I will say, by way of illustration, that if I say to a man, "This Government is tyrannical and unjust, and it ought to be overthrown"; and thereupon that man resorts to violence, as I have incited him to do, there becomes, according to the decisions of the courts, a conspiracy between that man and myself to do that thing. That principle was adhered to in the decisions in the Berger-Germer case, and in other cases that we had in the West during the war. In those cases there was held to be a conspiracy among people who had never seen each other, who had had no meeting of minds; but because one of them had read what the other said—and then proceeded to carry it into effect—that was held to be a conspiracy to do the act and to violate the law.

And that is good law. It is not necessary that a man should say, "I propose so-and-so," and the other should say, "I agree to your proposal," in order to constitute conspiracy. That is a mere legalistic formula and to so hold would make an absurdity out of the law. If there is an effect by one man's mind upon another man's mind until they assent to an unlawful mutual purpose, then that conspiracy is complete and they are subject to punishment, and under section 6 no overt act is necessary.

And I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that, as the members of the committee know, section 6 of the Criminal Code is not the only conspiracy statute. We have another statute which is much broader; it is section 5440 of the Revised Statutes. And I want to tell you that it is one of the most difficult statutes in the world to defend a man against; you open up everything. I have had some experience with it, and it is a most dangerous situation when a client is charged with the violation of that statute.

Mr. IGOE. Our experience here, from what district attorneys have told us in hearings that we have had, has been that the district attorneys resorted almost exclusively to the conspiracy statutes and never brought individual indictments where they could avoid it.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is quite true. Many district attorneys' offices do that. And in the course of my twenty-odd years' practice as a lawyer, much of which was in the Federal courts, I have been very greatly alarmed many times by prosecutions under that statute, because it is so hard to defend against it; you never know what to depend on; they may prove what one man says against another man, and vice versa; and in that way build up proof of offenses. A defendant's lawyer is completely at sea.

A BILL TO PUNISH MERE WORDS.

Now, I want to take up this Davey bill in particular. I heard what Attorney General Palmer said here the other day. He said this bill was for the purpose of meeting the case of a man who merely advocates, without results, the use of physical force. But as it so happens that is the very thing that is not punished by this bill. Pass this bill as it is now drawn and a man may go on advocating the overthrow of the Government by the use of physical force without committing a crime.

The CHAIRMAN. He said that was what he wanted, but he overlooked putting in two or three words that should have gone in.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. This bill does not forbid advising the use of physical force. It does prohibit a man from threatening to use physical force. Now, I want to call attention to a few of the terms of this bill. I will not attempt to cover all its objectionable features. It makes a criminal of any man who, with a certain intent, "threatens to commit" any act of force "against any person or any property"—not a public officer and not public property, but anyone who threatens to commit any act of force against any person or any property—is guilty under this act.

It goes even further; it makes a criminal of any person who "threatens to commit" any act of "terrorism, hate, revenge, or injury"—not by the use of physical force; not any act of violence, but any act whatsoever—where the act is directed against public property or any public "officer, agent, or employee."

"IT MAKES ME SHUDDER."

The Attorney General, speaking before the committee a few days ago, said that the Graham bill made him shudder. It makes me shudder, too; but this bill makes me shudder more; because I want to assure you that, in many respects, this bill is more dangerous than the Graham bill.

Mr. IGOE. I think it is generally conceded that those words as stated in the bill are impossible.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am glad to know that is the view of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee would have no hesitation in omitting those words from any tentative draft of a bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Now, if it is expected to strike out those words, "any act of terrorism, hate, revenge, or injury," then the remainder of that clause of the section, "against the person or property of any officer, agent, or employee of the United States," should also be stricken out, because it would have no meaning.

As I say, the remainder of that clause should be stricken out; then it remains an offense, with a certain intent, to threaten physical injury "to any person or any property whatsoever." I want to call attention to that phrase. That is going to a remote extreme; an extreme that the committee ought not to tolerate.

The CHAIRMAN. We would not do that under any circumstances; nobody in the committee is in favor of that.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Then, let me devote myself for a moment to another word—the word "threaten." And what I am going to say with reference to this word applies with equal force to other expressions that will be used in these bills—that must be used in them—because, as I started out by saying, the lack of accurate and well-defined terminology is a great difficulty in drawing this kind of legislation.

WHAT DOES "THREATEN" MEAN?

What is meant by "threaten"? It does not necessarily mean by words; a threat may just as well be made by a look, by a gesture, or by any other action.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, a look or a gesture probably would not overthrow the Government, would it?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. A look or gesture would not, but I think either would be just as effective as a word, because not yet have the foundations of government crumbled before mere words. But that relates to an aspect that I am not addressing, to the matter of policy.

Suppose the word "advise" had been used there, what would have been meant by that? If you pass any such law at all, you have got to use some such words as "advise," "advocate," "threaten," or something of the kind; and the first thing for you to ask yourselves is, what does this word mean and what does it include? What may a man do and be innocent, and what may a man do and be guilty under such a word?

Now, manifestly, no phrase that can be used will necessarily imply the use of any particular formula of words in advocating force. You are aiming a statute here at words. Now, what words are you aiming at? It certainly is at no particular formula; it is not necessary that a man should make a certain set speech in order to be a criminal under such a law as this; it is only necessary that he shall say or do something with this bad intent, which may possibly have the effect to produce the result that he intends.

If it is "advise," how is he to advise it? If I should stand on a street corner and harangue the crowd and say, "Congress is corrupt; the administration of the Government is base and partial; this is not a government of the people but a government of the few—it ought to be overthrown; it is un-American—we ought to destroy it. But remember, my auditors, not by force, not by force. We must adopt an amendment to the Constitution; we must go to the ballot box to correct these evils"——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). You could do that under any of the bills we have been considering.

TO CALL A GOVERNMENT "UNWORTHY" IS TO ADVOCATE FORCIBLE CHANGE.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Why, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is clear beyond argument that such a speech, although it has the qualifying expression in favor of peaceful methods, is really an advocacy of force. If I point out the propriety of force, I have advocated force, although I may protest "I do not mean force; we must go to the ballot box." Whenever I call attention to abuses, inadequacy, and injustice of government I am advocating that it should be overthrown, although I do not say, "Take up arms," or anything else of the kind.

Now, that is where the difficulty comes in with this kind of legislation. What may I say under the influence of strong feeling and the consciousness of wrong? What may I say without having the possible effect on some man to cause him to use violent methods?

If a given speech were addressed to you, gentlemen, it would not have such effect. If addressed to men of other environment and temperament, it might have effect to incite them to violence. Therefore the question always is, What effect was it calculated to have? Thereby my intent is found, and upon that I am convicted and made a criminal.

We heard this morning the statement of a gentleman who related that a socialist had said in a speech to an audience of workers on a New York street corner:

> The workers ride through crowded tunnels, breathe bad air, and stand hanging to straps, and sweat and strain after a day's toil, in order to make profits for a rich corporation, while above ground, in God's sunlight, the rich in their luxurious carriages roll to their palaces—

And so on in that vein. He thought the speaker ought to have been jailed.

TRUTH IS SOMETIMES TROUBLESOME.

But you gentlemen can readily see that the real trouble about that speech was that it was true. It dealt with facts. What is coming out of that sort of speech? Some men will say, "We will go to the ballot box—we will prevent the dangerous accumulation of wealth; we will put a tax on the men who have got those millions; we will forbid profiteering; we will correct the inequality by lawful means." But a man of different mold may say to himself, "We can not correct these conditions by peaceful means. I will take the matter in my own hands. I will end some of these conditions by force." And as a result there is violence.

There is nobody that has got any sense that would contend that everything is just as it should be; that conditions even in America are ideal; or that things can ever be made just as they should be. Humanity struggles onward and upward. We go forward. We suffer to-day that we may live to-morrow. We pass from lower into higher things. We fall under the car. I am crushed to-day in order that those who come after me may stand and live.

That is the appeal of humanity; that is the course of progress. I believe in God, and I believe that He will make this world perfect. But when that is done——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Then we would have Heaven here. You do not expect that, do you?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is what we should aim at, and when that is done, of course, humanity will have ceased to exist and we will have passed into the eternal substance.

ONWARD UNDER THE DIVINE WILL.

Since I have struck that thought, I trust I may be allowed to say that I believe that, under the influence of the Divine will, we are proceeding according to His utter and absolute knowledge in the way He wants us to go, onward and upward. Of course, conditions are not perfect now; and a thousand years hence some "wild-eyed radical" of that day will be clamoring and complaining of the abuses of that era which we would now regard as the utmost expression of felicity.

As I say, these conditions which are admittedly wrong exist. Are men not to be allowed to point them out? They will not be remedied if they are not pointed out. Yet in a measure of this kind, with the use of words of that kind—"advise," "teach," "advocate"—you will readily see that what may be said will fall, some of it, on barren ground, some of it on fruitful ground where it will mean peaceful change, and some of it on ground that is over-fertilized with suffering and injustice and will produce the rank and noxious weeds of violence and disorder.

Now, that is the great difficulty that confronts the committee. We must deal with it intelligently and carefully and with a view to allowing the expression of discontent and dissatisfaction calculated to provoke desire for change and improvement and all kinds of orderly constitutional progress and economic, political, and religious development.

I could not think of anything that I would rather not hear than a man blaspheming on a street corner. Surely I love my God more than I love my country. I am not more jealous of some man criticizing my country than I am of him criticizing all mankind, the earthly expression of Deity. Yet, we purpose to allow that to continue.

CRITICISM TO BE STRICKEN DEAD.

Those who are crying out for this bill, if there be any such—and I have not heard of many of them—they are willing that men shall blaspheme; they are tolerant toward moral delinquencies of all kinds, and all kinds of immoral teachings; but they have an idea so it seems that the laying of the hand upon our political structure is touching the ark of the covenant, and that a man must drop dead as the result.

Now, to proceed to the second section. I am only calling attention to these phrases as samples, as illustrations, of the expressions that you are bound to find in any bill that you consider. There are no other words to be used; it is impossible to report a bill that has not got these equivocal expressions in it.

Section 2 makes a criminal of whoever circulates any printed matter which "justifies" any act of force against the Government of "any person," or against "any property," with the intent denounced in the bill.

UNLAWFUL TO DEFEND CONFEDERATES.

Let me give an illustration: I come from a part of the country that was once in active insurrection against the United States. Our libraries there contain books written by sympathizers with the Confederate States which "justify" the South in the Civil War. Every one of those books is unlawful under this statute. They are clearly and plainly made unlawful, not by implication but by its actual terms, because they justify an act of force against the Government of the United States. There was force and violence used against the Government of the United States in the War of the Confederacy. And these books justify that and defend it; why, many of them, gentlemen, glorify it and call the men who did it patriots——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). And we have got busts of one or two of them over at the Capitol. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes. Gentlemen will pardon me; I consider myself a good American. I lost an ancestor at Brandywine and I have myself followed the flag as a common soldier, yet I am compelled to believe that men could have fought against the Government of the United States in the Civil War and still be patriots. I would be false to the very milk that I was nourished on if I did not feel so.

Understand this, that justifying the Confederacy is a direct violation of this law, for it does not merely make unlawful the justifying of acts of violence which are to be done in the future; it applies to justifying acts of violence done in the past. Those books would come directly within the law.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think any court would so construe it, although perhaps you may be right that that is theoretically against the law.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Possessing such books is clearly a violation of the law as this bill would enact it.

Now, let me go a little further: Advice may be given just as effectively by implication and innuendo as directly, and men can justify acts of violence against our Government, both future and past, by the use, as illustrations, of acts of violence against other governments. I could defend a revolution against the United States, by implication, by recounting the exploits and achievements of our Revolutionary ancestors.

WOULD OUTLAW DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

This country had its birth in revolution. It is in our Declaration of Independence. That declares the right, and not merely the right but the duty, to destroy a government when it ceases to perform its proper functions. Suppose I stand on the street corner and read the Declaration of Independence, and I cry, with a loud voice, "That to secure these rights—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—governments are instituted among men; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it," I would really be a criminal under this statute. I would be guilty, because my intent would be bad, and the effect would be there, and the commission of the crime would be complete under the statute.

And I might stand on the street corner and recount the story of the Russian revolution, the cruelties of the Czar, and what the people did over there, and by doing that, without referring to our own Government, or any abuse or defect in it, I might be encouraging people to rebel against the Government of the United States. I could be doing it actually, and yet I might be doing that with the utmost innocence.

IMPOSSIBLE TO PREVENT ABUSE OF SUCH LAWS.

So that the point I present to the committee—and I hope I have not taken an unnecessary length of time in doing it—is that, no matter what language you use in this bill, it is absolutely impossible for you to prevent cases where men may use exactly the same words and do exactly the same thing, and one of them be innocent and the other guilty.

And after all, it will come about, just as it did under the espionage act, that men will be tried by public opinion. If their standing is bad in the community, if their previous history is bad, if they are known not to be patriotic, and this and that, all of which facts can and will be laid before the jury, they will be convicted, for from such facts will the jury be required to find whether the accused really made the utterance with criminal intent.

Now, that was the administration of the espionage act. I voted against that act. Thank God that I did. It was unnecessary; its consequences are afflicting us to-day; it will continue to afflict us. The occasion for the measure that we are now considering is to cure conditions caused in part by the espionage act.

The CHAIRMAN. There is some doubt about that. This same condition exists the world over.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Not the same condition but other similar conditions, brought about by other and similar acts of repression and other and similar wrongs and abuses.

I accord to the chairman, of course, the right to his opinion; but I have mine, too, and I do believe that this espionage act has come home—and will come home—to plague us.

NOT A SPY CONVICTED UNDER ESPIONAGE ACT.

Under that act not a single spy, not a single enemy agent, has been convicted, not a man who tried to aid the Germans in the struggle with the United States; but, on the other hand, some thousands of American citizens, some of whom would have died for our country had they believed it necessary, but who did not think well of the war, or of conscription, or did not like Mr. Hoover and his processes, or did not like to be hammered by bond-selling committees and forced to subscribe to this, that, and the other thing—they said this and that; they made foolish speeches or said unpatriotic things—went to jail, convicted by public opinion. That is what convicted them. They were convicted by public opinion; and any law which makes it possible for men to be convicted upon their standing in the community simply legalizes lynching; and that is what it does, it legalizes lynching. Those who have good reputations and many friends and the ability to defend themselves get acquitted; on the other hand, the man who is under a cloud, has a bad character, and so on, is convicted on the general muster. It is legalized lynching; it legalizes mobbing by public opinion.

Now, as I said, these difficulties in framing a law upon this subject are inherent; they can not be escaped; and they point the necessity that the committee should exercise extraordinary caution in approving any language for this bill.

I repeat that, because of the inherent nature of the subject, any law aimed at the freedom of speech must be couched in equivocal, doubtful, and uncertain language under which it is inevitable that innocent men, who are ignorant and poorly defended, will be convicted, while guilty men who have high position and numerous friends will be acquitted. Such a law must inevitably be subject to grave administrative abuses and prove an instrument of oppression and tyranny in the hands of overzealous or arrogant officials. Such a law leaves the door open for the exercise of the widest discretion or whim upon the part of prosecuting attorneys and department agents. They will have it in their power to harass and indict innocent persons.

DESTRUCTIVE OF LOYALTY AND LOVE OF COUNTRY.

But it is not for those who may be convicted under a sedition law that I feel the deepest concern. Nor even is it for the innocent who may be unjustly charged and who may be acquitted. Rather is it for the common, average man who will be intimidated under such a law. I dread the effect of such a law upon the people generally. They are not lawyers—they do not know where the line between guilt and innocence is—they do not know what they may or may not say under such a law. They will be hushed up. They will be afraid to criticize, to discuss, or to speak upon political and public issues for fear they may transgress the law. It is bound to follow that their loyalty and love of country will be weakened. Again, I realize that the passage of a law against free speech will open the door to meddlers, busybodies, and eavesdroppers who will be incited to spy on their neighbors and to inform on them. There will be less of mutual confidence among men, less of trust and free intercourse. The solidarity of our community life will be impaired as the result.

The consequences which I have pointed out are inevitable. Can it be possible that this committee can not see them but will yield to the demand of the few who insist upon the passage of a sedition law?

Control of the Cotton-Boll Weevil.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RILEY J. WILSON,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 16, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives has rendered the country a most excellent service in voting down the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], which reduced the amount carried in the Agricultural appropriation bill for the investigation of insects affecting southern field crops, and especially for the control of the cotton-boll weevil. The results of the investigations and experiments for the control of the boll weevil made by and under the direction of the Delta Laboratory, located at Tallulah, Madison Parish, La., have been most encouraging and hold out, so far as I know, the only substantial hope for the ultimate control of this pest to such an extent as to make the production of cotton profitable in certain sections of the South at this time.

Some three years ago an amendment offered by myself to increase this very same appropriation was adopted by the House, and on account of the fund thus made available the investigations and experiments were made which produced the very interesting results forming the basis of the request of the Department of Agriculture for an additional increase this year. While the full amount requested by the department was not recommended by the committee, still the amount is sufficient to continue in a limited way the work of control for the coming year.

RESULTS OF EXPERIMENTS.

Experiments and tests made during the years 1917 and 1918 in Madison Parish, La.; Washington and Bolivar Counties in Mississippi; and Chicot County, Ark., indicated gains in production, due to the methods of control adopted, amounting to from 250 to 1,000 pounds of seed cotton per acre. These counties are all in what is known as the Mississippi Delta.

Experiments made in the Lower Rio Grande Valley in Texas in the counties of Cameron and Hidalgo also show very interesting and profitable results. For example, in this locality one farmer conducted a plat experiment where one-half of the cut was poisoned and the remainder left untreated as a check. I quote the result of this as reported: "On May 15, 1919, the two plats in this cut averaged 31 per cent of the squares punctured by the weevils. Poisoning was started on May 16 and on May 23, 17 per cent of the squares were punctured in the poisoned cut and 34 per cent on the check. On May 28 only 10 per cent were punctured in the poisoned cut and 37 per cent in the check. This work was continued, and a report of the examinations made on June 12 showed 5.6 per cent of these squares were punctured in the poisoned cut and 57 per cent in the check." In the same locality and in the same way another test was conducted on a separate farm and a report made June 12 showed an average infestation of 7 per cent in the poisoned cotton and 45 per cent in the unpoisoned. Other tests were conducted in that section and all indicated like results, and proved conclusively that the method of control being worked out by the Delta Laboratory may be successful under conditions other than those prevailing in the Mississippi Delta. An additional test was also made in south Louisiana, where conditions surrounding the production of cotton are somewhat different from those in the upper valley, and the results there were that the poisoned cotton made 463 pounds of lint cotton per acre and the unpoisoned 159 pounds of lint cotton per acre.

LOCALIZED CONDITIONS.

Since different conditions and circumstances surround the production of cotton in various localities, methods of weevil control which may be successful and practical on the large plantations of the Mississippi Delta and the Black, or prairie, Lands of Texas may have to be modified in the hill section of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia, and other cotton-producing States; therefore in order that the full value of these methods now in vogue under experiments heretofore made may be demonstrated and thoroughly determined, stations like that at Tallulah, La., should be established in many sections of the cotton belt. So it has been the purpose of the Department of Agriculture to locate such additional stations, and to make such tests and investigations in order to develop the proper methods for each particular section.

For instance, it has been found that the production of sea-island cotton under boll-weevil conditions is the most uncertain of all, if not impossible. In 1918 300,000 acres of land was planted to sea-island cotton; during this year the boll weevil invaded the sections where this cotton is grown. In 1919 only 65,000 acres was planted in sea-island cotton, and it is reported that in 1920 the entire crop may be abandoned. Some provision should certainly be made for experiments in this part of the cotton district.

THE INSECTICIDE.

The form of poison developed and now being used for the control of the boll weevil is dry powdered calcium arsenate. During last year this mixture cost about 25 cents per pound and is now being manufactured by a number of concerns throughout the country. When the demand has developed to such an extent that this mixture is used on a large scale the price will unquestionably be reduced.

THE MACHINERY.

The character of machinery for applying this poison is a very important feature in connection with its use. The production of this machinery is also in the experimental stage, with a present status about as follows: On large plantations power dusters have been used successfully, but these have been found too expensive for the man farming on a more modest scale. With this character of machinery it is possible to cover with one machine 70 to 80 acres per day. The applications are made at least once a week and sometimes oftener, depending upon weather conditions. A hand-gun duster has been found practicable for use in distributing the poison. With one of these it is practical to cover some 8 or 10 acres per day. This kind of duster can be manufactured to sell for about $15, and may serve the purposes of a man farming on a very small scale. It is highly important that an intermediate machine be produced to meet the needs of the average farmer cultivating from 80 to 200 acres. Such a machine is now in course of construction under the direction of the Delta Laboratory and when completed, according to estimates, should cover 20 to 30 acres per day, and sell for approximately $75.

The amount of the mixture saved by the new machinery now in course of development is also an important feature, as with the old machinery some 20 pounds per acre would be distributed whereas 4 or 5 pounds per acre will serve every purpose.

SUMMARY.

To sum up the needs of the department in this connection are as follows:

A continuation and enlargement of the services now being rendered by the station at Tallulah, La.

The establishment of like stations in various sections of the cotton belt, for the investigation and control of the boll weevil under conditions peculiar to each locality.

To proceed with the development of the machinery necessary for the proper and economical application of the insecticide.

To put within reach of the farmers in every section of the cotton belt the services of experts in the methods of controlling the weevil.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. ANDREWS,
OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 17, 1920.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered before the Nebraska constitutional convention, at Lincoln, Nebr., February 13, by Hon. C. F. REAVIS.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS DELIVERED BEFORE THE NEBRASKA CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, AT LINCOLN, NEBR., FEBRUARY 13, BY HON. C. F. REAVIS.

"Your work would be less difficult if conditions were more stable, if the problems which we somewhat vaguely characterize as the problems of reconstruction were better defined, if a better understanding of the needs of the future obtained. The very presence of this added difficulty inspires the thought I wish briefly to express to you. There is danger in a rigid and inflexible constitution; danger not only that it may prove inadequate for the future, but danger as well because of public resentment that the State can not function in response to manifest needs. As illustrating the point I have in mind, permit me to call to your attention the almost universal discontent in the industrial condition. Widespread dissatisfaction permeates the councils of labor. Never in the five years I have served in Congress has my mail been so burdened on any subject as it is now with expressions of resentment against existing conditions of labor. On the other hand, the great public is apprehensive regarding continued production of public necessities and is appealing for and demanding repressive legislation of the most drastic character. The situation is one for legislative consideration along the lines of a sympathetic understanding of the rights of all concerned in the difficulty.

FEARS A RAILWAY STRIKE.

"The recent strike in the bituminous coal fields made manifest the rights of the great unorganized public. Great as was the suffering and loss occasioned by this strike, it would be inconsequential as compared with a general strike on the railroads. Hundreds of milk trains carry the food to thousands of children in the cities each morning, who would starve within the week if transportation were tied up, and the first children to feel the hunger would be the children of labor. The loss to the agricultural and manufacturing interests and to labor would approximate national bankruptcy within 60 days. The condition resulting from such a calamity would be intolerable; and a nation too weak to prevent it is a nation too weak to maintain its own existence.

"The fear of such an event has resulted in a nation-wide demand for antistrike legislation. I am fully cognizant of the economic wastefulness of strikes. I recognize the validity of society's protest against them when directed at public necessities; but one thing which should be always borne in mind is that the very social order now protesting against strikes is the social order which in large measure is responsible for strikes. What remedy has organized society offered to labor to redress its wrongs other than that of the strike To what tribunal provided by law can labor carry its complaints of long or short hours, inadequate wages, or insanitary conditions surrounding employment? Suppose the employer refuses to treat with labor—and an instance of this character has been quite recently disclosed—what has society done to require both parties to state the condition and provide a remedy? The public has the right to continued production of those things essential to the public welfare, but common justice requires the public, in the exercise of its right, to protect the interests of all others concerned. To require men to work for inadequate wages and under insanitary conditions under penalty of the law is to be guilty of a system of peonage which is out of harmony with the spirit of our institutions. If we are to deny the right to strike in any public necessity, we must by the same legislation provide a tribunal to hear the merits of the controversy and to remedy whatsoever of wrong exists.

KANSAS LAW IS GOOD.

"Under the present constitution no such court as this can be provided. The action taken by the State of Kansas in providing what is known as an industrial court would be impossible in Nebraska. The only way in which this need could be accommodated would be by the legislature adding the jurisdiction to the district courts, which for obvious reasons I believe to be both unwise and inexpedient. I greatly prefer the language of the Federal Constitution which empowers the legislative branch of the Government to ordain and establish such courts inferior to the Supreme Court as the needs and exigencies of the people may require. I have examined the Kansas law with some degree of care, and while I believe experience will disclose the need for changes, nevertheless the principle is sound. Under the terms of this enactment strikes are forbidden in public necessities, but a court is created to hear and determine the issue between labor and capital, so that in the end the rights of all, including the rights of the public, are fully protected.

"I did not favor the antistrike provision of the so-called Cummins bill, because no adequate or workable provision was contained in the measure to protect either the rights of the public or labor. I favor the provision contained in the conference report on the railroad bill if it is as reported by the press.

"I am entertaining no illusions regarding the popularity of this proposal, but I am far more concerned with its righteousness than with its popularity. I realize that when the public provides for labor some means other than the strike to obtain its just rights that the walking delegate, strike leader, and trouble fomentor will be out of employment, and I am very certain that he will not submit tamely. I have always been sympathetic with organized labor. I have always believed that the conditions of his employment should be sanitary; that his hours should be moderate, and that his wage should be sufficient to permit him to rear his family in comfort and to adequately educate his children, for if this is to continue an efficient Government the children of each generation must have the advantage of our schools.

"I believe that one is a better friend to labor who advocates tribunals where justice will be granted him than is one who incites strikes that would starve and freeze 110,000,000 people and compel the Nation to face bankruptcy and revolution. To produce such a condition would result in an inflamed public sentiment that would be all powerful in its demands for drastic legislation destructive of organized labor.

BUILDING FOR A LONG TIME.

"I have cited this one illustration of a probable need that could not be supplied under the inflexible terms of the old Constitution. I feel that you gentlemen are building for a long future whose requirement no man may forecast. I believe that the people can be trusted to govern this State safely and sanely, and I believe that the constitution you prepare should so far as possible grant them the opportunity to do so. The sense of humor and common sense of our people are the greatest safeguards we have, and I trust to them implicitly.

"Nebraska will advance in the next half century far more than in the last half century. Things will be commonplace during the life of this instrument unthought of now. A higher civilization carries with it its own demands, a larger population creates many new requirements. Behind the curtain of the future the myriads await their hour, and if you but listen you may hear the 'tread of the coming millions.'

"You are building for all of these."

Agricultural Appropriation Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN McDUFFIE,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 18, 1920.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have listened with much interest to the arguments for and against the various items carried in this bill, and I have been astounded at the attitude assumed by some gentlemen on the Republican side with reference to this very important legislation.

This bill, caring for all the work in the Department of Agriculture throughout these United States, and for some work which probably is not a part of the Department of Agriculture, calls for only $30,000,000—a very modest sum when we contemplate the valuable services rendered to the country by this department.

If there ever was a time in the history of this Nation when we should encourage the production of food and raiment; if there ever was a time when the Congress should lend its every effort and appropriate every penny that is possible, in keeping with the condition of the Treasury, for the welfare of our agricultural interests, that time is now. In my judgment, gentlemen, one of the most serious conditions confronting this Government to-day is the movement of our people from the farms into the cities. Only a few years ago the majority, and the vast majority of our people, were in the country, while to-day a majority is in the cities. This is not a healthy condition for any Government. We should do everything in our power to make the farm attractive, and in order to make it attractive it must be made profitable. We can make it comfortable and profitable and more attractive by legislation like this which will provide experts and information at the hands of the Government for those engaged in the farming industry.

About all, Mr. Speaker, that the farmer gets directly from the Government to-day is a few garden seed, a few letters, and some information sent out from the Agricultural Department. Surely we should not, even in our madness to economize and in our anxiety for the Public Treasury, we can not afford to minimize the small service given the farmer by the Government to-day by cutting the appropriations for the various items in this bill. I have heard you talk about economy and how the country was crying for economy, all of which is true; yet, in my judgment, that economy which strikes at the basic, the fundamental, and paramount industry in all the life of the Nation will work irreparable injury to every man, woman, and child in this Nation.

Surely you gentlemen who continue to talk about the high cost of living and have not lowered it for the people of the country should appreciate the fact that the demand for food products, the demand upon the agricultural industry of the country, has become more and more intensified.

There are several items in this bill to which I would especially call your attention. For instance, the appropriation for the elimination of hog cholera. You gentlemen have actually cut the appropriation recommended by the Committee on Agriculture $100,000. Following the leadership of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who hails from that section of country which produces so many firearms, yet a country which uses much pork, seemingly unmindful of the effect of your rigid economy, you have hampered one of the greatest industries in the country. On one or two occasions during the consideration of this bill, when some one on the Democratic side asked that some item of appropriation be increased just a little, you have actually seen fit to decrease that appropriation, even though it be recommended by the Committee on Agriculture. Was it done for the sake of economy or simply to make us accept without question your suggestions as to this bill, and to punish us, if you please, if we saw fit to increase any item of appropriation in this bill? You have the majority and the power; but remember that you must answer in the future to the farmers of this land, who depend so much upon this legislation. Let us economize, but let us economize somewhere in our legislation other than in that which deals with the welfare of the farmers of the country.

I would call your attention to another item in the bill which, to my mind, is very important, and that is the item which makes appropriation for the Bureau of Crop Estimates. The department asked your committee for $967,782. In this bill you are carrying an item of $322,856, which is about $48,000 less than the amount available for the present fiscal year. This bureau performs a most important work. Demands are made on it from everywhere. The States Extension Service, transportation companies, banks, manufacturers, newspapers, farmers' organizations, individual farmers, and commercial bodies all call on this bureau. Especially was this demand great for the estimates of crops of various food products, cotton crops, and other crops during the war. You gentlemen can readily see the necessity of carrying on this work. For estimating nearly $7,000,000,000 worth of cereals the present appropriation carries about $87,350; for hay and forage, nearly $3,000,000,000 worth, it carries $16,000; for live stock, $11,000,000,000 worth, it carries $20,000; for cotton, worth nearly $2,000,000,000, it carries $18,100; for over half a billion dollars' worth of potatoes you carry only $10,000; for a billion dollars' worth of vegetable oil, in which my State is intensely interested, and the South as a whole, not a single dollar is appropriated to get and publish this information. For estimating $500,000,000 worth of fruit you appropriate $25,000; for estimating $157,000,000 worth of sugar you appropriate $2,900; for estimating $375,000,000 worth of tobacco you appropriate only $7,500. I wish to submit here the figures showing these estimates which I have roughly mentioned. I invite your attention to this statement giving the value of the crops named and the amounts available under the present appropriation for estimating them, as well as the amounts asked for by the department, with the view that the service might be enlarged to an extent commensurate with its vast importance:

	Value of crop.	Present appropriation.	Asked for 1921.
Cereals	$7,771,482,000	$87,350	$139,100
Hay and forage	2,741,657,000	16,400	53,275
Live stock	10,975,671,000	20,710	165,428
Cotton	1,587,445,000	18,100	38,970
Potatoes	595,000,000	10,400	33,990
Vegetable oils	1,000,000,000	.....	15,420
Truck crops	185,429,000	26,200	50,160
Fruits	530,401,000	25,225	61,480
Sugar	157,000,000	2,975	18,270
Tobacco	375,000,000	7,500	20,015

The State of Alabama leads all the States in the production of peanuts. She furnishes her share of cotton seed, from which vegetable oil to the value of a billion dollars is produced in the United States, and the farmers of my State are anxious indeed that some appropriation be made to have the value and the output of these oils estimated. The funds available for this bureau for the work in the State of Alabama during the remainder of this year are to-day less than $200. This fund is not sufficient to make one trip over the State between now and the 1st day of July. This is a very serious matter, gentlemen, and I beg of you not to overlook nor underestimate the importance of this work to the farmers of this land.

Again, I say, let us not only encourage the farmer but do something to keep our young men out of the cities, where they have gone to seek not only the white lights and a different life, but the unusually high wages, which to-day are offered by all industries, and which can not be met by the farmer. The fourteen millions of farmers in this country are looking to this Congress for legislation that will aid them in developing and extending and making more profitable the most important phase of all our industrial life. The farmer has patiently toiled from daylight until dark in order to meet the demands upon him for food. He has not demanded an eight-hour day, thank God, and will never do so. He hasn't followed the false gods who are to-day worshipped by the radicals, the Bolsheviki, the socialists, and all others who would destroy the fundamental principles of our Government. Is he to be rewarded at the hands of a Republican Congress for his patriotic services, for his untiring labor, by a stinting economy which strikes at his very existence? You will find, gentlemen, probably more conservatism, more genuine love of his home and his country, and I dare say more love of God Himself in the rural sections of this Government than you can in the cities. The farmer is the very balance wheel of all of our governmental machinery. I verily believe, come what may from those who would clog the wheels of our industries and tie up the arteries of commerce for selfish purposes, come what may from those who boldly say that they would not obey the law if it interfered with them in their purpose—I believe it will be the farmer, after all, with his conservative thought and action, who will save this country from disaster or ruin.

I do not mean to say that all of the intelligence, patriotism, and best thought of the country is in the rural sections, but the man in the country who is close to nature and nature's God, who sees the sun rise and set, hears the birds sing, breathes the pure air, and sees the flowers bloom is a genuine lover of his country, his home, and his flag. He believes in upholding the majesty of the law and he has profoundest respect for constituted authority. This Congress can render no bigger and better service than to encourage and stimulate to its maximum the progress of the American farmer.

"The politician talks and talks,
The actor plays his part;
The soldier glitters on parade,
The goldsmith plies his art.
The scientist pursues his germ
O'er the terrestrial ball.
The sailor navigates his ship;
But the farmer feeds them all.

"The preacher pounds the pulpit desk,
The broker reads the tape;
The tailor cuts and sews his cloth
To fit the human shape.
The dame of fashion dressed in silk
Goes forth to dine or call,
Or drive, or dance, or promenade;
But the farmer feeds them all.

"The workman wields his shining tools,
The merchant shows his wares;
The aeronaut above the clouds
A dizzy journey dares.
But art and science soon would fade,
And commerce dead would fall,
If the farmer ceased to reap and sow,
For the farmer feeds them all."

Grazing Fees on the Forest Reserves and Control of the Public Domain.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,

OF COLORADO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 11, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. HAUGEN] on yesterday offered an amendment to the pending bill, which appears on page 2717 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as follows:

Provided further, That no part of any appropriation in this act for Forest Service shall be expended on any national forest in which the fees charged for grazing shall be at a rate less than 300 per cent of the existing rate.

I have already, I think, shown in my remarks—pages 2764 and 2765 and 2775 to 2777 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 11, 1920—the very great and unwarranted hardship which such a provision as that would inflict upon the stockmen throughout the West. According to the reports of the Forest Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, there were some 39,252 permits issued by the Forest Service to people for grazing their stock in the national forests.

Those permits represented over 2,000,000 head of cattle, nearly 8,000,000 sheep, nearly 100,000 horses, and over 60,000 goats. Over 5,000 of those permittees live in the State of Colorado, which I have the honor in part to represent, and there are over 1,000,000 sheep and nearly 400,000 head of cattle that graze the 17 national forests in Colorado. The grazing fees now paid by the stockmen into the Forest Service amount to $2,600,000 a year; and by this amendment the chairman of the Agriculture Committee seeks to increase that amount to $7,800,000 a year.

I would not discuss this matter further at this time—because that particular amendment has been temporarily defeated in the committee—were it not for the fact that the chairman and other members of the committee have announced their determination of continuing this fight to raise the grazing fees. This effort to arbitrarily, and without any hearing, raise the grazing fees 300 per cent and compel the stockmen of the West to submit to it or get off of the forest reserves is so plainly unjust and self-evidently wrong to anyone who knows anything about the conditions of the West that it would seem to me to need no further arguing.

The cost of administering the grazing branch of the Forest Service is about a million and a half dollars a year, and the cash receipts from the stockmen amount to about $2,600,000 a year, so that the Government is making nearly a million dollars a year profit now on the stock growers of the West. But this sudden and high-handed move is being made for the purpose of compelling the people of the West who graze their stock in the national forests to pay for all the general public policy of conservation in this country, including the administration of all the timber activities and operations upon the reserves, and the thousand and one other things that money is expended for, and which are not in any proper sense chargeable to the grazing upon the forest reserves.

But this effort is not only an injustice but it is unconscionable and utterly lacking in good faith and fair dealing, because the stockmen of the West were given no notice or hearing upon this subject, and there is no authority in law for this action and this amendment has no proper place in this bill. If a hearing were had, the stockmen could easily have shown the vast difference that there is in conditions between raising stock in the national forests and raising them in the rich clover pastures of the Central States. I have already shown some of those conditions of disadvantage, and there might be many others mentioned. But I desire to insert in the RECORD a telegram I have just received from the Colorado Stock Growers' Association, which briefly voices their protest, as follows:

DENVER, COLO., February 11, 1920.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Ninety per cent of the membership of the Colorado Stock Growers' Association are permittees of Colorado national forests. In behalf of their interests we protest against any change in grazing charges on national forests until 1914, on grounds that present conditions are abnormal and would not furnish fair basis.

COLORADO STOCK GROWERS' ASSOCIATION.
By JOHN P. KLUG, President.

I want it distinctly understood that I am not at all criticizing the Forest Service, or blaming any of its officials or the Department of Agriculture in any way for this matter. I am criticizing this Agriculture Committee for this attempted arbitrary, high-handed, unwarranted, and outrageous action.

In the hearings before the committee last December both Col. Graves, the Chief Forester, and Mr. Potter, the associate forester, explained the situation very frankly and thoroughly. Mr. Potter, who is actively in charge, and has thorough personal knowledge of the grazing situation throughout the West, emphatically told the committee repeatedly that owing to the restrictions in the use of the national forests the grazing privileges on them are not actually worth as much as grazing on private lands without those restrictions, and that after making a thorough investigation they raised the price of the grazing fees in 1918 25 per cent and that again in 1919 they doubled the former charge, so that for the last year the increase in receipts from grazing in the forest reserves was $883,347.91 over what was collected in 1918. Mr. Potter further stated as follows:

Uncertainties in regard to the charges for grazing privileges have tended to unsettle many persons in the stock industry, particularly smaller men, who hesitate to assume obligations in improving ranch property—in other words, in building up their business—when there is likelihood of sudden changes in the rate of charge. To reduce these uncertainties announcement was made that it would be the policy to make readjustments periodically—in five-year periods, rather than from year to year. In addition, where the conditions on the forest are sufficiently settled as to the number of stock which can be allowed without injury to the forest or watersheds the issuance of five-year permits was authorized, and permits have been issued on this basis to a large portion of the permittees. These permits require the payment of a like amount in fees during the five-year period, but the permittees have been informed that at the end of this period the rates will be adjusted, either up or down, in accordance with values at that time. It is not contemplated that there will be any change in the base rate up or down between now and 1923. * * * We are trying to stabilize range conditions and do not believe the fees should be readjusted on the basis of the present abnormal conditions. * * * Our charge was based on the prices paid on about 3,800,000 acres of lands of similar character to those in the national forests, the greater part of which was owned by the States and the railroad companies. * * * I consider that we have been handling this in the right way.

Secretary Houston and Forester Graves have both advised the stockmen that "the policy of the Forest Service would be to recommend material changes in the grazing fees only at five-year periods, and has based its five-year permits on that policy." "Unless such a policy is adopted the five-year permit would be little more valuable than an annual permit, since it would be subject to radical increase in charges at any time, which charges might entirely upset stockmen's plans."

That last increase of 100 per cent, just last year, was agreed to by the stockmen upon condition that they be given a five-year permit, which was very largely done; and neither the Agricultural Department nor its Forest Service, nor Congress, nor the chairman of this committee "wants to repudiate a contract."

Congress can not either reduce the high cost of living or increase the beef supply of this country by imposing additional burdens at this time upon the stock raisers of the West, and I earnestly hope that the committee, before making any further attempt of this kind will go out through that western country and personally visit the forest reserves and hold hearings in each one of the States, and get the viewpoint of the people on the ground. If they do, I know they will ascertain that the Secretary of Agriculture and the Forest Service are correct in not recommending this raise in the grazing fees. And the committee will learn that the western stockmen are as fine a class of men as there is in the world, and that they are patriotically paying all they should be justly called upon to pay for the grazing privileges on the forest reserves.

I want to insert in the RECORD some statements submitted by the Department of Agriculture showing receipts and expenditures of the Forest Service during the past fiscal year, as follows:

TRANSFER OF THE PUBLIC DOMAIN FROM THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT TO THE AGRICULTURE DEPARTMENT.

For several years the American National Live Stock Association and a number of other stock associations have been advocating the Government control and supervision of all of our unoccupied public lands, and appealing to Congress to pass a bill transferring those lands from the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture and having them placed in the forest reserves, or at least having the lands controlled by the Agriculture Department as grazing commons similar to the laws and rules and regulations of its forest reserves.

I have many good friends and prominent constituents among these stockmen, who have appealed to me to advocate that kind of a measure. And I may say that for several years I have felt that there ought to be some systematic regulation or authority to make reasonable rules and regulations for the control of the grazing on the public lands outside of the forest reserves, subject, however, to the limitations that the lands may always remain open to prospecting, and exploration, and settlement, and entry by citizens under the various public-land laws and under the jurisdiction and control of the department that has charge of the public-land laws, so that the prospecting, settlement, and disposition of the lands and their use for grazing prior to such disposition may be consistently and harmoniously administered in the interest of the general welfare of the public development. But I am not in favor of hermetically sealing up those public lands and preventing settlement thereon and stopping the development of the West. I do not feel that that is wise or necessary or for the best interest of the general public's welfare, and yet that would be the result if the efforts of this Agriculture Committee were carried out.

The greatest need of the West is and always has been more people, more substantial citizens, more settlers and homes upon the public lands. With that object in view, I worked very hard and diligently for several years upon, and in fact I am credited with being largely responsible for, the passage of the 640-acre stock-raising homestead law; and the fact that during the short time since the lands have been classified for entry under that law nearly 50,000 homesteads have been taken and settled upon—and applications are being made at the rate of a thousand a month—conclusively demonstrates that the history of the West will overwhelmingly and forever approve of the passage of that act. I am also the author of the present isolated tract law. Both of those laws, and also the 320-acre enlarged homestead law, known as the dry-farming act, also the desert-land law, and, in fact, all but one of all the public-land laws for the settlement of the public domain would be immediately wiped out and thrown into the scrap heap if the public lands of the West were put under the Forest Service, because none of those laws apply to the forest reserve. No western Congressman who would seriously advocate such a proposition would ever dare go home and look his constituents in the face. And yet that is exactly what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], the chairman of the committee, is trying to do by the introduction of an amendment which appears at page 2722 of the RECORD of February 10, as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAUGEN: Page 37, after line 8, insert: "For the purpose of protecting, improving, and securing the fullest possible use of the public grazing lands of the United States, and promoting the production of live stock, $50,000; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized to establish, from time to time, by proclamation, grazing commons upon any of the unreserved, unappropriated public lands of the United States chiefly valuable for grazing; and thereafter such grazing commons shall be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, the violation of which shall be punished as is provided for in section 56 of the Penal Code of March 4, 1909 (35 Stat., p. 1900); and all laws applicable to the national forests, including appropriations for and the distribution of moneys received, the entry and survey of agricultural homesteads, and the right to prospect for and acquire mineral lands are hereby extended and made applicable to such grazing commons."

That amendment, with slight transposition, is a literal copy of Senate bill 1560, introduced on June 6 last by Senator KING of Utah, "by request," which is as follows:

A bill (S. 1516) for the regulation and improvement of grazing on the public lands, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of protecting, improving, and securing the fullest possible use of the public grazing lands of the United States and promoting the production of live stock, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to establish, from time to time, by proclamation, grazing commons upon any of the unreserved, unappropriated public lands of the United States chiefly valuable for grazing; and thereafter such grazing commons shall be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe; and all laws applicable to the national forests, including the distribution of moneys received, the entry and survey of agricultural homesteads, and the right to prospect for and acquire mineral lands, are hereby extended and made applicable to grazing commons created under this act. And any violation of the provisions of this act or such rules and regulations shall be punished as is provided for in section 56 of the Penal Code of March 4, 1909 (35 Stat., p. 1099).

SEC. 2. That the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated, to be available until expended, for payment of expenses necessary to execute the provisions of this act.

That bill is the one that is indorsed by the American National Live Stock Association. It was referred by the Senate Public Lands Committee to the Interior Department for investigation and a report, and on October 24, 1919, Secretary Lane made an exhaustive report thereon, which so completely covers this whole subject and considers it in such a broad, public-spirited way that I will insert that report in full, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, October 24, 1919.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt of your request for report on Senate bill 1516, entitled "A bill for the regulation and improvement of grazing on the public lands, and for other purposes."

(1) The purpose of the bill, as stated therein, is to protect, improve, and secure the fullest possible use of the public grazing lands of the United States and promote the production of live stock.

(2) To accomplish this purpose the President is authorized to establish from time to time, by proclamation, grazing commons upon any of the unreserved, unappropriated public lands of the United States chiefly valuable for grazing, such commons to be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture.

(3) All laws applicable to the national forests, including the distribution of moneys received, the entry and survey of agricultural homesteads, and the right to prospect for and acquire mineral lands, are made applicable to said grazing commons.

The purpose of this bill, as defined in the title thereto, as well as in the formal declaration contained therein, can not fail to call attention to legislation already enacted by Congress covering practically the same fields, to wit, the act of December 29, 1916 (39 Stat., 862), known as the stock-raising homestead act. This act, entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," declares that it shall be lawful for any person qualified to make homestead entry under the homestead laws of the United States to make a stock-raising homestead entry for not exceeding 640 acres of unappropriated, unreserved public land in reasonably compact form, provided, however, that the land so entered shall theretofore have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as stock-raising lands. The definition of the lands that may be so designated is lands the surface of which, in the Secretary's opinion, are "chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops, do not contain merchantable timber, are not susceptible of irrigation from any known source of water supply, and are of such character that 640 acres are reasonably required for the support of a family."

Comparing the purposes set forth in the stock-raising homestead law with those in the present bill, as well as the definitions found in the two measures as to the character of the lands under consideration, it will be seen that in effect no substantial difference exists between the present and the proposed law in either respect. In both cases the ultimate purpose is the same—the production of live stock; in both cases the character of the land is practically the same, to wit, lands chiefly valuable for grazing.

I am inviting attention to the similarity between the law we now have on the statute books and the proposed measure, for the reason that if it is found that the law as it now stands makes ample provision for the appropriation, control, and use of the public lands of the character under consideration, and for the same purpose, then it is certainly a matter of doubtful policy to provide a new measure to accomplish the same purpose which will without question operate effectively to largely defeat the purpose of the existing law.

The scope of the present bill, in connection with the foregoing, is a matter which should not be overlooked in so far as it authorizes the reservation of all unreserved, unappropriated public lands of the character designated to be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture with all laws relating to the national forests made applicable thereto. When it is remembered that of our remaining public domain the greater part is better suited to grazing purposes than other agricultural use, it will be seen that in effect this bill authorizes practically the inclusion of all of our remaining public domain in grazing commons subject to all the limitations incident to lands within national forests. Calling these reservations grazing "commons" does not in any degree relieve them from the restrictions attendant upon the reservation of public lands for any definite purpose. Here the paramount purpose will be grazing interests to the exclusion of the settler, the miner, or other applicant for title to the public domain except in so far as his case may not be found to be in conflict with the greater interests of the grazing commons.

The homestead privilege provided for in the bill, it will be noticed, is the forest homestead, for which provision is made in the act of June 11, 1906 (34 Stat., 233), applicable only to lands "chiefly valuable for agriculture and which in his—the Secretary of Agriculture—opinion may be occupied for agricultural purposes without injury to the forest reserves and which are not needed for public purposes." Of those lands entry may be made, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, in tracts not to exceed 160 acres in area.

So it will be seen that so far as the settlement laws are concerned the homestead privilege as it stands to-day will have but little operation within the domain of grazing commons except as it may find recognition in isolated instances without injury to the grazing commons and where the lands are not otherwise needed for public purposes; nor will there be any place for the operations of the timber and stone act or the law authorizing the sale of isolated tracts within the area designated as "grazing commons." In fact, in so far as the agricultural laws are concerned, they will be reduced to the forest homestead act, and the exercise of rights under the mining laws will be subject to the same restrictions that are now thrown about the administration of such laws in the national forests.

A reference to the proceedings in Congress, both in committee and in debate, on the stock-raising homestead law, discloses the fact that when it was under consideration the proposition of establishing grazing commons, or grazing districts, was then discussed with much insistence as a better use of our remaining public lands than their devotion to stock-raising homesteads. It was the view then of this department, a view which found acceptance at the hands of Congress, that the man of small means who desired to engage in stock growing upon public lands should be given an opportunity, and to that end the provisions of the stock-raising act were formulated and are now in course of administration. As an evidence that Congress properly understood the public needs and desires at the time it enacted the stock-raising homestead law, attention is called to the fact that since its passage there had been designated at the end of the last fiscal year an area of stock-raising lands of 20,181,868 acres, all embraced within applications, with applications pending for over 12,000,000 acres more. During the last fiscal year 14,248 petitions were received asking for the designation of lands under this act. Since the passage of the act 48,897 such petitions have been filed, and they are still coming in at the rate of over 1,000 per month. During the fiscal year 1918, 734 entries were allowed under this act, embracing an acreage of 236,578 acres. During the fiscal year just passed the total number of entries allowed are 15,037, covering an area of 5,559,235 acres. From the foregoing it will be seen that this law is being taken advantage of to the fullest extent and is well on its way to solve the problem of the best disposition of our grazing lands, for certainly no better use could be made than placing their ownership in the hands of small investors, who are thus personally identified with the stock production of the country. It was believed by the department and by Congress that the call for these lands for this purpose was genuine and deeply founded in a sound theory for the permanent development of our public lands, which, exclusive of their mineral content, can only be secured by uniting ownership with settlement and use with taxation under the laws of the State.

As against this policy adopted by Congress, after the most thorough consideration of the whole subject, successfully inaugurated, and before sufficient time has elapsed to give it a fair trial, it is now proposed practically to abandon the whole program by placing all lands of the same character, in so far as they have not already been appropriated under this or other laws, in grazing "commons," where the man without means, whether he be homesteader, desert-land claimant, or miner, will labor under the disabilities inevitably encountered where lands are reserved for a specific purpose, even though exceptions be made thereunder.

No report on any bill that proposes to control our grazing lands through the establishment of grazing districts, or commons, would do the subject justice without calling attention to the various "grazing bills" that have heretofore been under consideration in Congress. The report of this department of June 14, 1912, on Senate bill 3462, in the Sixty-second Congress, contains a historical sketch of this tentative legislation, as follows:

"This bill is based upon and differs only in minor particulars from the bill recommended by the American National Live Stock Association at its Denver meeting, January 22, 1902, which was, I believe, introduced in the Sixty-first Congress, second session, Senate 6345, by Senator CURTIS. The association bill was an adaptation of the Burkett bills of the Fifty-ninth and Sixtieth Congresses, which were drafted in the Department of Agriculture after a painstaking investigation by experts (see appendix to report of Public Lands Commission, pp. 5–61, S. Doc. 189, 58th Cong., 3d sess.), and in the light of the experience of the Forest Service in the control of grazing in the national forests. The Lever bill in the present Congress, H. R. 19857, is in almost the same words as Senate 3462, differing in but a few points. The measures now before the two Houses are, therefore, the products of long and painstaking studies of the problem of range conservation and embody the general conclusions of careful students and experienced administrators of the range-control policy, with which the most influential representatives of the industry affected have agreed."

The bill then under consideration, however, did not receive favorable consideration at the hands of Congress, it having prior thereto enacted the enlarged homestead act of February 19, 1909 (35 Stat., 639), authorizing homesteads of 320 acres of "nonmineral, nonirrigable, unreserved and unappropriated, surveyed public lands which do not contain merchantable timber," otherwise known as the "dry-farming bill," operations under which would have been seriously restricted, if not prevented, by the passage of the proposed grazing bill, Senate 3462. The wisdom of this line of legislation as affording an opportunity for and inducement to settlement and establishment of homes is apparent from the fact that in the last five years patents have issued for nearly 40,000,000 acres under the homestead law, the larger part of which was taken under the provisions of the enlarged homestead act, that otherwise would have remained undeveloped. All this goes to the conclusion that legislation which denies the intending settler an opportunity of acquiring a home on our agricultural lands is not founded on a sound policy for the development of our national resources.

In my judgment, there is no room for the operation of the stock-raising homestead law and this bill within our public domain. Either one or the other must yield precedence, and the enactment of the present law should be accepted as the final verdict of Congress on this question. But if the measures were not incompatible I should be averse to any legislation that contemplates such a broad withdrawal of our remaining public lands from the general operations of the settlement laws on which alone the Federal Government must rely for their actual development, and to which the States must ultimately look for their reduction to private ownership and due assumption of the burdens of taxation with other lands of like character.

Congress will, of course, consider this measure in the effort to reach that conclusion, which will be best for the general public interest and not for the interest of a limited number of citizens, to the detriment of a larger number. In this connection I note that the bill was introduced "by request."

I have before me the verbatim report of the proceedings of the live-stock producers of certain Western States at a meeting held at Salt Lake City, July 22–23, inclusive, 1919, and note that a resolution was introduced and passed urging the enactment of this measure, and that the people present there decided to raise funds and take the necessary steps to urge the enactment of such legislation. A form of contribution blank for those who desired to contribute money to be used by the stockmen's association in support of a campaign for the control of Federal grazing lands was provided.

I do not question the propriety or right of these gentlemen to take any steps which they deem necessary to further their financial and other interests, but I do think it important that consideration should be given to the question as to whether their interest is one which is paramount to that of thousands of citizens who are seeking claims and homes on the remaining public domain. One of the delegates to the meeting above mentioned said:

"I feel that the public domain is fully occupied and that there is not any room for the beginner. I think the men in the stock business to-day, whether it be sheep or cattle, should be protected."

It appears from this that the idea is that the remaining public lands should not continue open to disposition to citizens generally, nor should opportunity for their grazing use be accorded to other citizens who may desire to engage in the live-stock industry, but that the vast area still remaining undisposed of should be reserved for the benefit of those in the stock business at the present time.

Another delegate urged that the convention should go on record as being "opposed to the 640-acre grazing homestead act."

At another point in the proceedings one of the delegates criticized this department because in creating the stock driveways authorized under the stock-raising homestead act they were not made large enough "to furnish any grazing."

The proceedings at the meeting in question clearly indicated the attitude of those who were urging the enactment of this bill. The other citizens of the United States, approximating 110,000,000, have not directly expressed themselves upon the subject, but as indicated on page 7 of this letter, 48,897 applications for stock-raising homesteads have been filed since the passage of the act of December 29, 1916, and applications are now being presented at the rate of more than 1,000 per month. This certainly evidences a demand for lands of this character by citizens of the United States who wish to acquire them under the homestead laws, and indicates a feeling on the part of those citizens that they will be able to engage in the live-stock business in a small way.

It was the theory of the stock-raising homestead bill that it would promote and encourage the production of live stock in the West, and that theory has not been disproven up to the present time. Moreover, the last few years, because of the war and war conditions, have necessarily curtailed to a large extent the seeking of homesteads on the public domain and the development thereof. It may be safely assumed that there will be an increased demand for some time in the future for homesteads from returning soldiers and other citizens relieved from war activities. In my opinion, they should not, in this situation, be denied the opportunity through the creation of a vast grazing reserve within the limits of which not a single homestead entry under any of the homestead laws of the United States could be made, except the so-called forest homestead, not exceeding 160 acres in extent, and only allowable in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

I believe that the public domain should be open to legitimate development and use, and not reserved and held out by the making of large withdrawals in the future. Congress has recognized the advisability of releasing large areas already withdrawn by its action upon the bill for the development of deposits of coal, oil, gas, phosphate, and sodium, and the water-power bill.

I am therefore of the opinion that instead of adopting the policy proposed in this bill, of practically reserving from disposition the remaining public domain for the benefit of the few, that it should continue open to acquisition by the general public under the homestead and other public-land laws, at least until such time as the bona fide demand therefor shall have ceased or greatly diminished.

It should be remembered that the use of the public lands by those engaged in the live-stock industry is not a right, but has been permitted only by sufferance, and that nothing has been paid or is being paid therefor. Consequently those who have enjoyed this bounty for many years are not in position or possessed of such rights or equities as warrant the exclusion of their fellow citizens from the opportunity of acquiring a portion of this land. If it be the desire of Congress that the grazing on public lands pending their disposition should be regulated and controlled, that end could be accomplished by granting authority to make reasonable rules and regulations for the grazing thereof and the payment of a moderate fee for the privilege, leaving the lands, however, always open to prospecting, exploration, settlement, and entry by citizens under the various public-land laws. Any such regulation of grazing on the public lands should also include reserved lands of like character, and be under jurisdiction and control of the department now charged with the administration of the public-land laws, so that the prospecting, settlement, and disposition of the lands and their use for grazing prior to such disposition may be consistently and harmoniously administered in the interest of all concerned.

In my opinion, S. 1516 should not be enacted.

Cordially, yours,

(Signed) FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary.

Republic or Democracy?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES J. THOMPSON,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 17, 1920.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following:

SPEECH DELIVERED AT LINCOLN DAY BANQUET AT DEFIANCE, OHIO, FEBRUARY 12, 1920.

"There are some people who involuntarily assume a belligerent attitude at the sound of the word 'Defiance.' The good old Saxon tongue had no part or parcel in its conception or projection; some warlike genius hitched it into our language by the wedlock of two little French and Latin words, in themselves harmless and of good report, but in combination producing an English word with a bellicose meaning. The French prefix 'De' married the Latin word 'fides.' Thus we have it, 'De'—meaning from or out; and 'fides' (faith)—out of faith with those who oppose us—'Defiance,' the act of defying; a challenge to meet in combat or contest; hence, a call upon some one to prove an assertion or accusation; opposition or disregard openly expressed in words or actions. Within a couple of blocks from the spot whereon we now stand, 126 years ago, Gen. Wayne, of Revolutionary fame, by an act defied British soldiers by building a fort; that was defiance by action. He also defied them by words, for tradition saith that Gen. Wayne, as the walls of the fort assumed their desired form, remarked that he could here safely defy the savages, the British, and all the devils in hell to take him. 'Then,' said Gen. Charles Scott, who was present, 'call it Fort Defiance.'

"Proceeding from this very spot, August, 1794, Gen. Wayne and army passed down the Maumee River to a point where was fought the Battle of Fallen Timbers. The valley of the Maumee between Defiance and that historic field is as superb in scenic beauty as the River Rhine in Europe and almost as historical. The banks of the Rhine bristle with historic monuments. The Maumee Valley has none. The history that Gen. Wayne made at Defiance and vicinity marks, in fact, the closing scenes of the War of the American Revolution.

"Gen. Wolfe handed to the British Empire Canada in its present geographical form; but how many people, my friends, realize that Gen. Wayne handed the American Nation all that vast domain north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi Rivers, embracing four mighty States, of which Ohio alone is greater to-day in wealth and population than the entire British Empire was in the days of Queen Elizabeth. The work of Gen. Wayne was not fully appreciated in his day, and has not been so far by posterity.

"Pompey the Great, when he presented to the Senate and the people of Rome the submission of Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine as the trophies of his conquering armies, and when the illustrious Cæsar forced Egypt, Africa, and Gaul to bow to the supremacy of Roman authority, by the voice of public gratitude they were made masters of Rome.

"At the confluence of these splendid rivers at Defiance Gen. Wayne should at least have a memorial shaft towering toward high heaven as a mute and eloquent witness of the empire that was here, by the heroic efforts of him and his legion, added to the great American Republic and given over to a noble civilization.

OBJECTS OF THE MEETING.

"The whirligig of time covering so great a period of 126 years has produced wondrous changes, and here, to-day, upon this historic ground, hallowed by the tread of the soldiers of the Revolution, in this beautiful and growing city of Defiance, representatives of another generation of Americans are assembled, not to defy but to deify and extol the memories of great Americans.

"Robert J. Ingersoll paid the memory of Lincoln a mighty tribute in 17 words when he said, 'Abraham Lincoln is the one in American history of whom the last word will never be written.'

"Lincoln and Washington each have a birthday in February. What a magnificent contrast between the lives of the two men, and yet what perfect unity they present. Washington, the aristocrat; Washington, the slaveholder; Washington, the proprietor of a vast domain of magnificent acres; and Lincoln, born in the midst of the humblest conditions. Washington was by birth, by association, by education, by lineage, and by possessions the conservative man of his time and the conservator of property. He could, of course, when the occasion demanded, and when he believed the rights and liberties of the country were at stake—he could pledge his life, his honor, his fortune, for the salvation of the rights and the liberties of his country; and when it came to put a new institution into process—the writing of a constitution, the founding of a genuine republic—he planted in them such conservations and preservations for posterity and for personal liberty against revolution as exist in no other system of government in the world.

"Lincoln was born in a log cabin of one room with an earthen floor among the poor whites of the South, where the conditions were such that they paralyzed hope, ambition, and work, but if he had been born under similar conditions in a foreign land, even with his ambitions, his indomitable energy, his magnificent brain power, and his superb faculty of reaching and appealing to the people, he would have seen that above him was the crust of social and political conditions which would permit no man of his class to rise except that crust were broken into pieces and ground to powder by social revolutions. And for this purpose Lincoln might have been a Bolshevist or an anarchist. And yet, under the institution which aristocracy founded, this man of the people, this great commoner, born under such conditions, reached the same place from that cabin that George Washington reached from his palatial mansion and his baronial acres on the Potomac. And Abraham Lincoln gave to the preservation of his country the same magnificent energy, the same superb patriotism, the same genius that George Washington did for the foundation of the same institution. One at the social property extreme, the other at the social poverty extreme—these two men, more than any others in the world, illustrate the magnificent opportunities, the superb hopefulness of American liberty. What one, coming from the top, did for the foundation of the Republic, the other, coming from the bottom, did for the constitution of the States and the salvation of the Republic.

"Their story, their lives, their opposition, and their union, illustrate that in America there is no place, no time for anarchists; no place, no time for bolshevism, which is but another name for pure democracy and chaos, but always a place and everywhere a time for energy, for pluck, for ambition and brains. Therefore, let none of us be misled by that crafty term 'make the world safe for democracy'; let us rather dedicate ourselves here to-day to a mighty campaign of education which will make America safe for the Republic.

1920 CAMPAIGN.

"The World War is over, but the war of 1920 is on. Again we are on the field of battle where 'thought contends with thought—the field of battle where facts are bullets and our arguments are swords.' We Republicans are to appeal to the good sense, to the conscience, to the patriotism of the American people, and right here at Defiance is as fitting a place as any to hurl defiance at those who would overturn the Republic and feed the sullen fires of revolution. To the Sixty-fifth Congress was assigned the tremendous task of saving civilization—namely, the prosecution of the World War. To the Sixty-sixth, or present Congress, is committed the task of ascertaining whether or not civilization was worth saving; how far we have departed from the landmarks of the National Constitution; and to interpret the meaning of that crafty catch phrase 'make the world safe for democracy.' We did not go to war to make the world safe for democracy but that American citizens, American ships, and American commerce might sail in safety the seven seas.

POLITICAL UNREST SINCE 1896 AND RESULTS.

"For years this country has been on a political spree. Mr. Wilson and Mr. Bryan, theorists, opportunists, and idealists, as they apparently are, and the great political party which they now assume to represent and lead, all are jointly more or less responsible for present conditions, because the people have been misled. Those political leaders belong to a school to the doctrines of which none of us here to-day should unreservedly subscribe. There has been much prating about democracy and a hue and cry raised about making the world safe for democracy. Lincoln, whose memory we meet here to-day to revere, was not a Democrat. He never used the word democracy. This may seem a startling assertion, but it is said by those who have searched the pages of history that it is true.

"Early in 1896 it was the consensus of opinion that all that was necessary for the Republican Party to do was to name the candidate for President and that his subsequent election in November would be but a simple matter of ratification by the electors. But the then young orator from the Nebraska prairies, the apostle of populism, set the country on fire at Chicago by his famous speech known as the 'Crown of thorns and the cross of gold.' In the campaign which followed instead of a walkaway as the managers of the Republican Party had anticipated, it was all they could do to defeat the election of Mr. Bryan for President on his 16 to 1 platform. Mr. Bryan's first nomination for the Presidency, in my opinion, marked the end of the old, or real, Democratic Party, the principles of which were discarded at that memorable convention and nothing left but the name Democrat. The true-blue Democratic Party in protest against the political rape of the Populists nominated the national Democratic ticket of Palmer and Buckner. All the Populists were not farmers; they lived in the villages and towns—in the great cities. All the failures—no matter for what reason—were on the Populist side; they wanted to get rich by law; they were tired of work in 1896. They are tired of work now. Many of them are the idealists, the dreamers, the mild Bolshevists of America to-day which is but another way of saying that to-day they are trying to make the world safe for democracy. Then came the national administrations of McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft, followed by the Progressive movement in 1912, which split the Republican Party and assured the election of the nominee of the Baltimore convention, which had been swayed by the eloquence of Mr. Bryan, to name Mr. Wilson for President. I have recited thus, briefly, recent political history, as I wish to make the point that for 24 years from the date of the Chicago convention in 1896 the country has been more or less in a state of unrest, and it has been on a wild debauch during the eight years that Bryanism has been permitted to function and exemplify officially in governmental affairs under the guise of Wilsonianism which has been making wild appeals that the world be made safe for democracy. The events of war have accelerated the unrest smoldering in this country the past 24 years. As a consequence, the world is in a state of flux, and we are in the midst of a period of inflation rather than prosperity. We are swinging away from respect for our national Constitution. America is hysterical with wild theories largely as a result of the teachings and leadership of idealists, both in and out of office.

OUR GOVERNMENT A REPUBLIC, NOT A DEMOCRACY.

"The framers of our Constitution made our Government a 'government of laws and not of men,' which means that no man's authority, that no exercise of arbitrary power of any kind shall deprive the citizen of his life or liberty or property without 'due process of law.' It is the very antithesis of a rule of might and of the exercise of autocratic power. It places the law above kings and presidents and governors; above generals and armies and military power; above all earthly authority not exercised and in accordance with the Constitution of the United States.

"Lincoln understood his country to be a Republic and not a democracy, and it is an innovation in the life of this country to refer to our Government as a democracy. Up to 19 years ago we scarcely—I might say never—referred to our country as a democracy. The men who founded this Government were more fearful of democracy than they were of autocracy, and said so just as clearly as I am talking now. For a thousand years prior to the writing of our Constitution government in Europe was swinging back and forth from one extreme to the other, just as it is now doing in Russia and Germany, swinging back and forth from the extreme of autocracy, which has always resulted in tyranny, to the extreme of democracy, which has always resulted in chaos. The Government of the United States is neither an autocracy nor a democracy. It is the happy medium. It is a Republic, founded by Washington, Franklin, Hamilton, and their peers. The men who founded this Republic did not believe in the divine right of kings to rule. They were afraid of the mistakes of kings. Neither did they believe in the divine right of ten thousand times ten thousand kings to rule, because it meant pure democracy, and democracy meant confusion and chaos. They founded the happy medium—a representative Republic. They delegated their power; they provided not for initiatives nor referendums, but concentrated their power in representatives with full authority to act as agents of the people. The main thing they had in mind was to stop the swinging of the pendulum from one extreme to the other and protect the individual rights of person and property; and, while it may not be popular to say so, yet it is quite evident that there was no intention by the men who founded this Government and wrote our Constitution that any question would be submitted to the people, and during the first 100 years there were no questions submitted to the people.

"After the Constitution had been written, Hamilton, Jay, and Madison were appointed to interpret the work. They made a very clear distinction between a republic and a democracy and said they had founded a republic.

"Forcefully, in the Federalist, Madison called attention to the gross misuse of the word 'republic' in his day. He was very jealous of the use of the term. He was extremely conscious and justly proud of having played an important part in helping found the first genuine republic in history. He knew the difference between an autocracy and a republic, and he objected to having autocracies spoken of as republics. He also understood quite clearly the difference between a republic and a democracy. His description of democracy in the Federalist is a splendid word-picture of the Russia of to-day.

"The men who founded this Government had no thought of founding a democracy or of making the world safe for democracy. Perhaps 75 per cent of the ills from which this Nation has suffered during the last several years are due to the prevalent misuse of the word 'democracy.' Aristotle, the ancient, is quoted more on the science of government than all the other men who ever lived before our national Constitution was written. He said that autocracy was one extreme and must result in tyranny, because the element of heredity enters in. Then he said that democracy resulted in chaos, because it was based upon emotion and mob spirit. The world has been growing mob-minded during recent years through the mob appeals made by men in all countries and all parties. What Aristotle had in concept Alexander Hamilton and his followers created. They provided for a representative government, the golden mean between autocracy and democracy. When these men founded this Government they evolved the standard form of government. Our Constitution was to the science of government exactly what the Golden Rule is to the morals of philosophy. Gladstone observed that our Constitution was 'the greatest piece of work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man.'

"William Pitt, the greatest statesman England ever produced, and the greatest ever produced in the world outside of American soil, said, when he read our Constitution: 'It will be the wonder and admiration of all future generations and the model of all future constitutions.' He could not possibly have put it stronger than that; which was saying, in effect, that it was a standard and should have been adopted by every country in the world.

BANEFUL EFFECTS OF DEMOCRACY.

"It was about the year 1905 that the people began talking about the initiative, the referendum, the recall, and recall of judicial decisions, and boards and commissions. This agitation caused some States of our Union, which had adopted republican forms of government, to begin drifting away from their moorings. Ohio is one of those States which we all know seems to be suffering from an overdose of Coxism and that peculiar brand of commission government and socialistic democracy exemplified by the present State administration, backed up by the State constitution of 1912, which less than 50 per cent of the voters of Ohio adopted. Our State constitution is embellished and decorated and festooned with all the frills and futilities of pure-democracy fads, many of them fashioned after the Wisconsin constitution. It is a well-known fact that prior to 1912 Gov. Cox sent a commission to the State of Wisconsin to study its State constitution as a model for Ohio.

COMMISSIONS AND LEAGUES WRONG.

"One of the present troubles in Congress is the pressure brought to bear to have it perpetuate and create commissions, boards, and bureaus. Many functions established by exigencies of the war are seeking to perpetuate themselves by endeavoring to induce Congress to appropriate and to legislate and thus to continue the function or duties of this or that board or commission. This method of government belongs to the unwritten constitution of the United States, which is being built up by reason of the influences from which spring slogans such as 'make the world safe for democracy.' Should war-time boards or commissions be encouraged only slightly by this Congress, it amounts to simply permitting the camel to stick his nose under the tent.

"The logical sequence will be that the succeeding Congress will discover that the camel had walked squarely into the tent and will be demanding appropriations of the taxpayers' money to feed, nurture, and maintain him. The commission system of government had become intolerable in the great State of Illinois until a Republican governor and a Republican legislature, by one enactment, struck out 128 boards and commissions, and they were scarcely missed, while the taxpayers of that great State were saved millions upon millions of dollars. Objection to the commission system is that it really establishes a fourth department of the Government, which is responsible neither to the voters nor to the legislature nor to the Executive. Alexander Hamilton was perhaps the greatest governmental genius the world ever knew. When he saw Congress appoint the first board he said, 'This, in my opinion, is a bad plan.'

"I think we will concede that Abraham Lincoln had as much to do as anyone with saving the Republic; he said he would do it under the Constitution, whether he freed the slaves or not, and the last thing he said, on the night of his assassination, just before he started for the Ford Theater, was to Mr. Ashmun, who had presided over the convention in 1860 which had nominated Lincoln for President. Mr. Ashmun called on him and reminded him that he still had the gavel he wielded in that convention and how highly he prized it, and after a short conversation he said, 'Mr. Lincoln, I am interested in a cotton claim, and I want you to appoint a commission to investigate the matter and report.' Lincoln replied with so much earnestness and warmth that he afterwards apologized to Mr. Ashmun for his abrupt manner, 'Ashmun, I have done with commissions; I think they are contrivances to cheat the Government.'

"That is apparently the best definition ever given of a commission, and it applies to all of them without exception. It is almost as perfect an illustration of the usefulness of a commission as Russia is of the benefits of democracy. It is well that Lincoln said on that last night of his life after he had had all the earthly experience he could and after he had reached the sanest judgment that is possible, and I wish that those words might be written all over this country in letters of fire by day and with moving electric lights by night as the last solemn warning of the mighty Lincoln against the wholesale appointment of boards and commissions which is threatening this country and this State and threatening the safety of the world. The League of Nations is nothing more nor less than an international board or commission to regulate the peace of the world, endowed with great executive power amounting to a super-government, responsible to no government and threatening the very Constitution of the United States unless its teeth are drawn by the United States Senate.

IDEALISTS, DREAMERS, ANARCHISTS.

"On the 20th of last October I had occasion to visit the committee room of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, and as I opened the door of that splendid, spacious chamber I beheld it filled by a body of fine looking men—Senators, clerks, and witnesses. An investigation was being held concerning the strike in steel industries in the United States. Senator KENYON was presiding, seated at the head of a large and long wooden table, at the opposite end of which was seated a handsome man of perhaps 40 years of age, well groomed, bright, intelligent, and a witness. The name of the witness, I subsequently learned, was Jacob Margolis, of Pittsburgh, one of the attorneys of the I. W. W. organization. His parents were Russian Hebrews, but he was American born—a native of the city of Pittsburgh. In early life he had been a newsboy, a graduate from the Central High School of Pittsburgh, and later a graduate of the Pittsburgh law school—a brilliant and ready public speaker, quick at repartee—a man of pleasing appearance and brilliant mind. But he, like many others in this country with brilliant minds and high and lofty ideals, seemed to have but little respect for the Republic and the Constitution. He is one of the class that rather believes in the birth of a new freedom and making the world safe for democracy. The first question I heard as I entered the door was asked by Senator MCKELLAR:

"Mr. Margolis, do you believe in truth?

"Mr. MARGOLIS. As Spencer defines it.

"Senator MCKELLAR. How about truth as Webster defines it?

"Mr. MARGOLIS. Truth is an abstract word. It is an abstraction. If you mean absolute truth, we know nothing about it. We talk about relative truth. Spencer, for instance, defines truth to be the inability to conceive of the negative of a proposition. Whenever I can conceive of the negative of a proposition, then I call it 'truth,' but whenever you say to me, 'Do I believe in truth,' I can not say 'yes,' because I do not know what truth you are referring to.

"Senator MCKELLAR. But you do not believe in truth?

"Mr. MARGOLIS. Not as an abstract thing.

"Senator MCKELLAR. Do you believe in honor?

"Mr. MARGOLIS. That is another abstraction.

"Senator MCKELLAR. I understand you do not believe in God?

"Mr. MARGOLIS. I do not.

"The CHAIRMAN. You are an atheist?

"Mr. MARGOLIS. I am.

"Senator MCKELLAR. You do not believe in any churches?

"Mr. MARGOLIS. I do not.

"Senator MCKELLAR. You do not believe in any government?

"Mr. MARGOLIS. I do not. I believe that human society can get along without government, and that if certain conditions prevailed that the people of this country, or, for that matter, of any other country, can do away with the causes for government, and then they would not have to have any government.

"The CHAIRMAN. What are those conditions?

"Mr. MARGOLIS. I believe that the reason for the existence of government—these are my beliefs—that the reason for the existence of government is the fact that there are two distinct groups in our society, one group which owns things and derives rewards from such ownership, and the class of producers, and by reason of that division between those two classes that government exists in order to protect the property interests of the owning class, and I believe that the elimination of classes in our society, that there would be no need for any divisions into such groups, and when such conditions prevail government will be superfluous and unnecessary.

"Senator MCKELLAR. Don't you think that this is the best Government in the world for a man to be allowed to live under, for anybody to be allowed to live, where he or she to be——

"Mr. MARGOLIS (interrupting). No, sir; I can not think that at all, Senator.

"The CHAIRMAN. How would you describe yourself?

"Mr. MARGOLIS. First, syndicalist. I put the syndicalist first, because it is the important thing; syndicalist-anarchist would be my position.

"The CHAIRMAN. And what are they?

"Mr. MARGOLIS. They are communist anarchists. They believe that all that is needed is education.

"A clergyman who wrote freely to his Congressman concerning governmental affairs used this remarkable language:

"I desire to say, my dear sir, that I am for the treaty and league pact, though I did not vote for President Wilson, and at every opportunity I support both the treaty and the league. It is silly and mere twaddle to say that the dicta of George Washington are applicable to present-day national and international problems.

"I am sorry that I must characterize the 'irreconcilables' as victims of a narrow, selfish, provincial nationalism, lacking in vision and statesmanship and giving no consideration whatsoever to the idealism and statesmanship of Jesus Christ.

"I have quoted these two distinguished professional gentlemen because I wish to show that the country is honeycombed with able, well-educated, and brilliant idealists who take Wilsonianism on faith and aspire to make the world safe for democracy. They lurk everywhere. They are in the pulpit; some of them members of the bar. All trades and professions have them. A percentage of so-called educators are tainted. The newspaper profession has a large percentage who, in many instances, for circulations' sake, forget their duty to their country and fail to mold a public opinion in the right direction. Seventy per cent, it is estimated, of the men in public life do not adhere to the Constitution and are constantly playing the popular fallacies, appealing to the mob mind and making class appeals. All these citizens would resent being called Bolshevists. In Russia the Bolsheviki is simply a political party and Bolshevism is extreme democracy.

CONSTITUTION INSPIRED.

"Mr. Margolis, the able and distinguished lawyer from Pittsburgh, the attorney for the Industrial Workers of the World, openly and defiantly and brazenly, in the teeth of the United States Government on Capitol Hill at Washington, advocates that there is no necessity for any political government—industrial government is all that is needed. He belongs to the class of dreamers and idealists in this country who are talking about nationalizing and democratizing all your industries. It's the new catch phrase to fool the people. It's the first step toward Russianizing them. The gentleman of the cloth undoubtedly honestly hopes that the League of Nations may lead up to the millennium, but most respectfully to him, as well as to the Pittsburgh lawyer, and to all others of their class, everywhere and wherever situated, I proclaim and say that I think—and I would like to have the preacher do a little thinking on this subject—that I think that the Constitution of the United States was inspired, that it is a sacred document and as vital to our interests to-day as it was when first written. For four weeks, day after day, the convention labored in vain. Not a word nor a single sentence had been written when, on the first morning of the fifth week, Benjamin Franklin, one of the wisest men who sat in the convention, arose and, addressing Gen. George Washington, who was in the chair presiding, said:

"Mr. Chairman, we have been groping for four weeks in the darkness searching for political truth and have not found it. How is it that we have not invoked the divine guidance of the Father of light upon our proceedings? The longer I live and the more I know the more I believe that God governs in the affairs of men, and if the sparrow can not fall without His notice is it possible that an empire can rise without His assistance? Except the Lord build the house they labor in vain who built it. I firmly believe this, and I also believe that without His concurring aid we shall succeed in our political building no better than the builders of Babel. I therefore move you that from henceforth we open our daily deliberations with morning prayer.

"And from that moment they began to make progress in the framing and adoption of that fame-crowned old document.

DUTY OF AMERICAN PEOPLE.

"The American people should endeavor to preserve and cherish that which Aristotle had in concept and what Hamilton and his followers created and what John Marshall interpreted, what Daniel Webster expounded, what Abraham Lincoln saved, and what, in my opinion, McKinley tried to perpetuate.

"A distinct house cleaning is needed at Washington and Columbus, where commissions galore, bureaucracy, and lofty disregard for the popular will and the Constitution itself have become intrenched.

"The classes and elements in this country hiding behind the slogan, 'Make the world safe for democracy,' if not removed from full power in the State and Nation will eventually lead, in my opinion, to revolution and the overturning of the Republic of our fathers. Even now there is an attempt to sovietize by indirection the Congress and the Government of the Republic at Washington. Only the common sense and patriotism of the majority of the people have the power to prevent such a catastrophe. It is high time that the Republic itself be made safe from further attacks upon its integrity. Genuine Americanism should prevail.

TRIBUTE TO SOLDIERS OF WORLD WAR.

"On the 17th day of last September, the one hundred and thirty-third anniversary of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States of America, I was impressed by the happy coincident which enabled me officially to participate in the review of the parade of returning soldiers, under the leadership of Gen. Pershing. I stood upon the reviewing stand with uncovered head and observed the ceremony of the parting of the streaming laurels of victory that had been stretched across the entrance of the triumphal arch on Pennsylvania Avenue at Washington as Gen. Pershing, at the head of his magnificently mounted staff, proudly rode up to the arch and under and through it, followed by that victorious Army of seasoned men representing 2,000,000 of the best and noblest young manhood ever placed in arms across the seas. We Congressmen greeted them with joy on that occasion, with joy and gratitude, proud of their achievements, grateful for their service, and with a welcome that comes from the heart of every loyal American citizen to every American soldier called to service at home or abroad. And I could not refrain from nurturing the fervent hope that as that magnificent Army melted into civil life, surrounded by the peace and plenty of this blessed country of ours, that they would support the Constitution and its established principles of liberty and justice as worthily and devotedly in peace as they had in war."

Grazing Fees on National Forests.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL HAYDEN, OF ARIZONA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 11, 1920.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, as I have stated before, the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] does not infringe in the slightest degree upon the discretion now lodged in the Secretary of Agriculture with respect to the rates to be charged for grazing on the forest reserves. All of the other proposed amendments which would have required the stock growers on the national forests to pay double or triple the existing grazing fees, an increase over what they are now paying of from $2,600,000 to $5,200,000 each year, have been defeated by the points of order which I raised. I am confident that the Secretary of Agriculture will use the Rubey amendment as a pretext to abrogate the existing five-year grazing permits. Between now and the time when such permits expire by limitation in 1923 the Forest Service, in cooperation with the cattle growers and flockmasters, will be able to work out a new policy which I trust will be fair and equitable to all concerned. I doubt very much whether the Secretary of Agriculture will needlessly expend the additional $25,000 to make the appraisals called for by that amendment, because any data collected this year would probably be valueless by 1923.

In order to demonstrate that this is not a new question, I shall avail myself of the privilege granted me and extend my remarks by reprinting in the RECORD a colloquy between the then chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and myself when the Agricultural appropriation bill was under discussion in the House on January 5, 1917, a little over three years ago:

"Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to bring to the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture a serious protest which I have received from the stockmen in my State relative to the proposed increase in grazing fees on the national forests. As I understand the situation, the cost of administering the grazing on the national forests is now more than repaid by the grazing fees received, but it is proposed by the Secretary of Agriculture to increase the rates, in order to place the grazing within the national forests on a commercial basis. At the time the national forests were created it was never contemplated that the grazing fee should be based upon what the traffic would bear, and, as a matter of fact, if cattle and sheep were not grazed within the forests and the grass was allowed to grow, there would be greater injury to the timber by fire than exists. Therefore, the grazing of live stock tends to preserve the timber. But the Forest Service has of late changed its policy and now proposes to place the grazing on the national forests on a commercial basis; in other words, to get all out of it that it is possible to obtain. Now, when the live-stock interests in my country, on the national forests of Arizona, are paying enough to cover the cost of administration and more, the stockmen feel that they should not be further taxed to make up a deficit that occurs elsewhere in the administration of the Forest Service. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the Committee on Agriculture has recommended this increase or is in any way responsible for it?

"Mr. LEVER. The Committee on Agriculture does not have power by straight legislation to regulate these fees. That power has been delegated to the Forest Service. It was brought to the attention of the committee by the gentleman in charge of the forest work in this country that it was contemplated in the future to raise the grazing fees in the Forest Service probably 100 per cent, covering a period of about three years. The impression made upon my mind by those gentlemen who presented the case for the department was that this proposed increase in the grazing fees upon the national forests was entirely satisfactory to the bulk of the cattle and sheep men of the West.

"Mr. HAYDEN. I can state to the gentleman that such is not the case so far as the cattle growers and woolgrowers of Arizona are concerned.

"Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will permit. And I understood that they would be gratified, as a matter of fact, if the department adopted the policy of increasing more largely the grazing capacity on ranges by proper fencing and digging of water holes, and the like of that—matters that go in the cattle business. Now, the committee has acted upon that theory, and in another section of the bill has made provision for increasing the usefulness for grazing of the national forests by allowing an increase in that item of $50,000. It was brought to the attention of the committee, as I said a moment ago, that the cattlemen and sheepmen, if those conditions were met, would be entirely satisfied with the raise proposed by the Department of Agriculture. The present grazing fees are almost nominal, as the gentleman quite well understands.

"The present charge ranges from 48 cents to $1 a year upon cattle, with a charge of 25 per cent of that rate for sheep, and more than that rate for horses. Now, to the minds of the committee those are quite reasonable fees. In fact, to the minds of the committee they are almost a nominal fee, and the committee, I think, feels that if a reasonable increase of the grazing fees can be had without any undue hardship upon anybody, at the same time carrying with it the idea of increasing the grazing capacity of the ranges, it would not be a bad thing to do.

"Mr. HAYDEN. But what I wanted to ask——

"Mr. LEVER. And if the gentleman will permit me further, we have testimony to the effect that the cattlemen and the sheepmen would agree to that proposition. Let me read a letter addressed to the Secretary of Agriculture recently. I read:

"'The honorable the SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE,
"'Washington, D. C.:

"'The members of the Blue Mountain Cattle & Horse Raisers' Association, Umatilla County, Oreg., offer no objection to the proposed increase in grazing fees, provided, first, that after this proposed increase is made the stockmen be assured that no further increase will be made; and, second, that an adequate percentage of the increased fee be appropriated each year for range improvements, etc.'

"As I said at the beginning of my statement, the impression made by the officers of the Forest Service upon the committee was that if the department adopted the policy of improving the range conditions, the cattlemen and the sheepmen would have no particular objection to a reasonable increase in the grazing fee.

"The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CONRY). The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

"Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

"The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

"There was no objection.

"Mr. HAYDEN. What I wanted to ascertain was whether or not the Committee on Agriculture of the House and the members of the committee were responsible for this raise?

"Mr. LEVER. Oh, no. The raise has not gone into effect as yet, as a matter of fact.

"Mr. HAYDEN. In proposing such a raise in grazing fees?

"Mr. LEVER. Oh, no.

"Mr. HAYDEN. I ask that question because of the statement given out by the Forester that, stung by the criticisms in Congress to the effect that the Forest Service is not securing from the national forests all the revenue that should be produced, he has recommended this increase in the grazing rates.

"Mr. LEVER. I want to be entirely fair with the Forest Service. There has been undoubtedly in the past very severe criticism of the Forest Service because the receipts from that service have not been greater. Individual Members of the House have come to me, even this morning, complaining that the forests ought to be self-sustaining, and that the fees and the rents and the like of that are too small. Members have complained to me as to these grazing fees—complained to me personally, and probably the statement of the Forest Service, as given to us by the gentleman from Arizona, is based upon the truth. I am satisfied that members of the committee, probably in the cross-examination of the witnesses before it, have indicated more or less they thought these fees were too small. We have not suggested to them the raising of the fees outright at all, but——

"Mr. HAYDEN. The objection made by the stock raisers in Arizona is that the fees now collected more than pay the cost of administering the grazing in the forests of my State, and by doubling that fee the Forest Service is going to collect much more money and make a great profit off the grazing in that State—money which will be used to cover up the deficit occasioned by the necessity of conserving timber or other resources in other States and in other places in which they have no interest.

"Mr. LEVER. There may be something in the gentleman's complaint, and I am satisfied that the department would be willing to make allowance for things of that kind.

"Mr. HAYDEN. I realize that this proposed increase in grazing fees is to be made by a regulation issued by the Secretary of Agriculture, and that it is not a matter contained in this bill. I also know that it would be both vain and useless for me to offer an amendment prohibiting the Secretary from making the proposed advance, because such an amendment would be subject to the point of order that it was an attempt to legislate on an appropriation bill, which is prohibited under the rules of the House.

"Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

"The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arizona yield to the gentleman from Washington?

"Mr. HAYDEN. With pleasure.

"Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the fees for grazing have been raised?

"Mr. HAYDEN. No; but it is proposed to raise them by increasing the rate in three annual increments, so that at the end of three years the rate will have been doubled.

"Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. So far as the Forest Service being stung by the criticisms that have been made of its administration, is it not a fact that the Forest Service, in order to devote the money which Congress is appropriating for roads in the forests, in order to make a showing in behalf of the grazing reserves, had to arbitrarily double the figures of the amount received from grazing?

"Mr. HAYDEN. Evidently they are trying to get the money from somewhere, and the grazing fees seemed to be an easy place to get it."

"Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And naturally they are called upon to produce the sums necessary to cover the deficit arising on account of the expenditures they are making for roads.

"Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

"The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

"There was no objection.

"Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, under the permission just granted me I desire to have printed in the RECORD the following letter from one who is fully conversant with the methods of the Forest Service, and which clearly sets forth the position of the stockmen of Arizona:

"Mr. WILLIAM BABBITT,
"President Coconino Cattle Growers' Association,
"Flagstaff, Ariz.

"MY DEAR MR. BABBITT: You have no doubt recently received correspondence relative to the proposed increase in the grazing fees on national forests until in 1919 the fees will be double the present rate.

"This I believe to be of vital importance and a question upon which some immediate action should be taken.

"From a letter recently signed by the Secretary of Agriculture relative to this proposed increase is the following:

"'One of the leading criticisms of the management of the national forests is that they are not self-supporting and are a burden upon the National Treasury.'

"Our national-forests areas were originally withdrawn and are still maintained to conserve the great natural resources of the West. This has placed in Government control beyond individual exploitation, except under Government regulation, unknown millions of dollars in natural wealth which is and will continue to be increasingly of vast importance to the Nation.

"In California there are forests withdrawn for no other purpose than the protection of watersheds on which the grazing of live stock is such a negligible factor that it could not be considered.

"In Florida areas have been withdrawn under Forest Service management to protect the turpentine industry.

"In Oklahoma is a forest withdrawn for the purpose of perpetuating the buffalo, and in the Northwest are forests withdrawn to conserve the timber, and on which practically no stock graze.

"In spite of the fact that the national forests were withdrawn and are now maintained to conserve the great natural wealth of the West, which grows more valuable at a tremendous rate as time goes on, and which is a national investment of incalculable value to the whole people,

"In spite of the fact that the moneys derived from grazing on the forest more than offsets the cost of its administration.

"In spite of the fact that there are turpentine forests in Florida, buffalo forests in Oklahoma, hardwood forests in the Appalachians, and softwood forests in Washington in which the stockman has no interest except such as any other citizen would have, yet they are asking the grazing permittees to make up the fiscal deficiencies on these forests from Palm Beach to Seattle and from the Appalachians to the Pacific coast; and that this is the purpose of this proposed increase is most conclusively borne out by the following quotation from District Forester Reddington's letter in support of this advance in fees:

"'The great criticism of national forest administration is that they are not self-supporting. This change will make them so.'

"If the great timber forests of the Northwest, the watershed withdrawals on which the grazing of live stock is prohibited, that the water may not be polluted nor the valleys flooded, and all the others that are not self-supporting, are worth conserving and maintaining, then this great Government of the United States should bear the expense of the maintenance of such units as are of no direct benefit to specific communities, and the cost of administering those units withdrawn for the benefit of separate communities should be borne by those directly benefited and not attempt to wring from the meat producers of the West this deficit under the guise that grazing privileges on national forests are worth double what they now are compared with the price paid on Indian reservations and private lands, thus placing the arbitrary value on the privileges with no more argument or study in support of it than has so far come to light.

"Relative to the 'bonus' paid on stock using the forests, this same statement can be made to apply to the public domain, the Indian reservations, and wherever stock are grazed, and when the time comes that a bonus can not be paid for located stock over and above their market value on board the cars a period is reached in the use of that range which shows most surely that other conditions are unfavorable in the extent that it would not pay to locate there, because everyone knows that it costs money to locate stock on an unfenced range and can not be done without loss.

"I have read with interest the article by T. S. Woolsey, jr., in the June, 1916, issue of the Forest Quarterly, 'National forest revenue and organization.' He makes the statement that grazing fees on national forests should be two or four times as much as at present, and to prove this he cites the following, which I quote:

"'For example, on the Apache Indian Reservation, the 1916 year-long rates for cattle were $2.50 and 50 cents for sheep. These rates were the result of competitive bids. Forest Service timber sale rates are in theory at least also fixed by competitive bids. On the Sitgreaves, which joins the Apache Indian Reservation, the year-long rate for cattle is 48 cents and for sheep 12 cents.'

"Such an unqualified statement I believe to be misleading to the public and should not go unchallenged.

"Just what is the comparison between grazing on a national forest and an Indian reservation?

"Sheep and cattle are not allotted to the same range on an Indian reservation, nor do they allow on the same area more than one permittee, which is of great advantage in the economic use of the area.

"On a national forest they do.

"On an Indian reservation a permittee may buy the stock and grazing privilege of the whole reservation if he so desires.

"On a national forest he can not.

"On an Indian reservation you may construct as many small inclosures as you desire without extra charge for the forest material necessary for its construction or the area involved.

"On a national forest you can not.

"On an Indian reservation the permittee is reimbursed for permanent improvements made on his allotment by the deduction of that amount from his grazing tax. On a national forest he is not.

"On an Indian reservation the lease and privilege is for a term of five years, and no advance can be made during that time, which is of immense value to the lessee. On a national forest only an annual lease can be obtained, and a raise in fees possible each year.

"Do permittees on an Indian reservation own patented land and water 'commensurate' to their stock? On a national forest they are compelled to own land and sufficient water which, on the Coconino Forest mentioned in Mr. Woolsey's article, is more than enough to destroy the use of this forest for grazing purposes should the stockmen close their own water, at least until such time as more could be developed, which would be years, and then only in uncertain quantities. The stockmen have made the full utilization of the Coconino Forest possible at their own expense; and on the Canyon division of the Tusayan Forest, which joins the Coconino on the west, there is not a drop of water except that developed by the stockmen. This also applies to the northern portion of the Coconino of approximately one-half million acres. Furthermore, as you know, a drift fence was completed last summer at a cost to the cowmen alone of $10,000. Not only that, but the contract with the Government was so drawn that the cowmen must keep this fence in good repair for 10 years, at the end of which time it becomes the property of the United States. This fence was constructed to prevent the overstocking of national forest ranges and is in the interior of the forest and entirely on forest land. Mr. Woolsey also fails to mention the fact that the Coconino National Forest pays a net return over and above the cost of its administration of from $65,000 to $100,000 annually.

"The live stock on the Indian reservation may change hands as often as desired without reductions, thus permitting the stockman to take every advantage of the live-stock market.

"A grazing permit on a national forest must be held at least three years before it is transferable, and is then subject to a cut of 20 per cent.

"And so on and on one restriction follows another until in actual fact and in actual operation there is no comparison between grazing privileges on a national forest and on an Indian reservation from a commercial standpoint, and the very best proof of this is that grazers on both the Sitgreaves and Coconino National Forests are making every effort to dispose of their holdings on these forests and go to the Indian reservation instead, but are hampered by the drastic regulations governing the transfer of their holdings on the forests.

"The Forest Service has to this time expended hundreds of thousands of dollars to perfect and maintain a system for preventing and fighting forest fires; yet this would not be a 'drop in the bucket' to what would have to be expended were it not for the live stock that keep the excess under cover and grass down to a point where the spread of fire is minimized. These areas would not be forests, but fire traps instead, which means a direct saving to the Government of vast sums of money in actual cash, besides an incalculable amount of valuable timber. I understand that the service is seriously considering the placing of live stock on parts of some forests where they do not now graze as the cheapest and most effective way of combating that greatest of all menaces to a forest—fire.

"The Forest Service has spent thousands of dollars in an exhaustive study of the timber business, which goes into great detail as to the cost of logging, the cost of transportation, the cost of milling, the depreciation on the plant and rolling stock, capital invested and interest on same, and then sells the timber so that the manufacturer can have a fair profit, which to my mind is sensible and fair.

"Has the stockman ever had such a study made of his business?

"No. Yet the department has more than doubled the present rate on live stock and has set the last date of hearing for February 1, 1917.

"The semiarid States of the West must always be the great breeding ground of the United States. National forests in these States will therefore always be a very important factor in the production of live stock and its products. The forests now embrace the high timberland principally adapted for summer use as a grazing ground, and they do not control winter forage land in a sufficient quantity to support the summer areas, and they are fully utilized now only because the woolgrowers find winter pasture far removed from the summer areas.

"With the 640-acre homestead bill, with the constantly increasing difficulty experienced in trailing to their winter range, the time can not be far distant when there will be grazed on the forests only that amount of stock that can winter on the lands immediately adjacent to it; therefore I am of the opinion that the department should be urged to protect their summer areas by including enough winter range to support them.

"When this is done and the Government obtains control of the land and water now owned by the stockmen, then, and not until then, in my opinion, can the grazing resources of the national forests be successfully commercialized in a manner that will rebound to the public good.

"The Forest Service has promulgated and have now in force a regulated system of grazing on their forests of which they may justly be proud, covering an almost unbelievable range of conditions as wide as this great country itself. This has been possible through the very closest cooperation of the stockmen and the service, a condition enjoyed in no other branch of the Government service, irrespective of its age or worth. Shall this most beneficial condition be destroyed by placing this proposed arbitrary advance upon the grazing resources of our national forests without that measure of consideration and study as is employed in other forest commodities?

"The cooperation and support extended the service in the past shows most conclusively that the stockmen not only do not fear but favor the regulation of their business based upon fairness and 'the greatest good to the greatest number'; but they do fear regulation such as this proposed one, based, it pleases me to believe, on prejudice and misinformation in asking the stockmen to pay the interest on a Government investment of increasing value to the whole people.

"Very truly, yours, E. H. CRABB.

Fourth Anniversary of the Battle of Verdun—Homage of the French Government to the American Dead—Efforts of France Culminating in Her Great Victory in the World War.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, to-day being the fourth anniversary of the Battle of Verdun, which was begun February 21, 1916, and which was one of the pivotal battles of the war, I think it proper at this time to refer to the efforts of France in the World War, especially as the French Government is presenting to the nearest of kin of our heroic dead at this time testimonials of the homage of the French Government. Nothing could more typify the spirit of France in the war than the Battle of Verdun did.

Begun on February 21, 1916, it lasted until July 1, 1916, or 131 days. During that period France passed 65 divisions through the battle, and of these divisions 3 were used, after a period of rest, twice, making a total of 68 divisions used in the battle. The numerical strength of these divisions which were used is estimated to be 1,100,000. The Germans passed 42½ divisions through the battle with the strength of approximately 900,000 men.

The battle was a costly one for the Germans, and was one of the greatest victories of French arms. I desire, Mr. Speaker, in extending my remarks to include my speech in Bridgeport, Conn., which I am leaving Washington to-day to deliver.

"Mr. Chairman, members of the American Legion of Bridgeport, invited guests, and friends, I thank you for the great honor extended to me to-day to present to the next of kin of our heroic soldier and sailor dead the testimonials of the French Government. I feel, as you all do, that the spirits of the dead are with us to-day and that, in the greatest sense of the word, we are come together in a hallowed place apart. Thrilled as you have been by the self-sacrifice of our men on land and sea, inspired, like you, with their devotion to duty, I address myself to a short statement of their deeds with humility and with pride.

"To you who are the next of kin of those whose memory we enshrine I extend the sympathy of two nations—of France and of the United States. But with that sympathy you have a priceless heritage that no man can take from you. 'It is a sweet and a noble thing to die for one's country,' wrote the Latin bards of old; and in the sweetness and the nobility of the death of your crusaders—for they were crusaders—you will find the calm repose for your sorrows that the world can not give.

"The thoughtfulness of the French Government in preparing the memorials is characteristic of it. France, the world has always said, knows how to do things. She knows from her long experience with men and with nations that behind the panoply of war and above the smoke of battle and beyond the sufferings of the field of honor there is, in every land, among all peoples, recognition of the duty to support one's country, if need be, with the last drop of blood. It was found of old in the hearts of those who faced the rising sun to liberate the Holy Land from the Saracens; it was expressed in the actions of her chivalric knights of the Middle Ages; even in the disorders and bloodshed of the revolutionary days the passions of men did not engulf it; in the last seventies it fought a losing fight against a superior and prepared foe; and to-day this central theme of nationality in French history stands out as vindicated in a victory purchased at a horrible cost. France knows, as the world knows, that there is no adequate recompense suitable for the individual. The glory of victory for each is the glory of victory for all. With her energy spent, with the graves of her sons crowding her fields where once heavy harvests grew, she thinks in her sorrow of this, her sister Republic, and in her characteristic manner she prepares a parchment that will be honored with a place in every home from which our men went quick with life, never to return.

"Like France, her memorial is noble in its simplicity. She gives to their memory her homage, than which she has no greater gift. 'The people should come to pray at the graves of those who died for their country,' she quietly reminds us, and she knows we will do her bidding.

"Why is it that our heart thrills with the thought of France? Friendship, alone, is the great answer. When in our youth, without resources, without aid, without even a cohesive plan of action, we endeavored to throw off the oppression of an unfriendly ruler, in France alone did we find a friend of strength. Herself a stumbling block to neighbors surfeited with the hoary doctrine of the divine right of kings; herself recognizing liberty, fraternity, equality as the fountains of government (even if secured only through travail), she saw in the Colonies friends in need, and came to us with men, money, and material.

"Lafayette came! Born to royal blood, nurtured in the highest traditions of the aristocracy of France, he saw, as Jefferson saw, in every man a free citizen and a bulwark of the Nation.

"He placed his whole resources at the disposal of Washington, and brightened an otherwise dark hour for the early colonists. The field of Brandywine ran red with his blood, but he considered it a privilege to shed it for a liberty-loving people. Like Washington, he was a revolutionist. He was for constituted authority as long as that authority voiced the will of the people, but he was against such authority when it lost sight of the common people and steeped itself in autocracy. At Mount Vernon, Va., to-day, the birthday of the Father of Our Country, one of the prized relics of the shrine of freedom is the key of the Bastille, presented by Lafayette to Washington in memory of their friendship.

"Rochambeau came with the fleet of France and strengthened at sea the waning power of the fighting Revolutionary Army. The memory of Washington and Rochambeau made more easy the sacrifice of the men whose memories we honor to-day.

"France, my friends, has come through the war with the same unsullied record that we have. When the fateful days of the summer of 1914 brought crisis upon crisis in the affairs of Europe—when the Austrian ultimatum was sent to Serbia and Armageddon was threatened—Sir Edward Grey, secretary of state for foreign affairs for England, proposed to ask for the cooperation of the German Government with a view to the mediation of the four powers not directly interested in the Serbian question, namely, England, France, Italy, and Germany.

"France was ready to accept this mediation. But the plan failed.

"It was a dark day for France when the die was cast, but it was the darkness that comes before the dawn.

"Her foe thought France weak, but found her strong; she was considered surfeited with ease, but was found courageous in trial. Her enemies looked for disaster, but found her a giant in strength. The mailed fist thought it would write the last page of French history, but instead it wrote only the prologue to a glorious new chapter. There were those who thought France had forgotten her God, but behold, her champion dedicated her armies to the Almighty!

"She emptied herself for the cause of liberty.

"With an army of but 585,000 men in three classes, she recruited from her population of less than 40,000,000 a mobilized strength in the army and navy during the conflict of 8,655,000. Her dead and missing numbered 1,365,735. More than 3,400 were totally blinded, and 42,000 suffered amputations. Think of it, my friends—3½ per cent of her total population killed or missing and 16 per cent of her war strength gone! Had we suffered in the same proportion, we would have had nearly 4,000,000 dead.

"These figures were prepared for me by the Chief of Staff's office of our War Department.

"In addition to supplying her own forces, France was called upon, and responded willingly, to supply England, Italy, Roumania, Russia, Serbia, Belgium, Greece, Poland, Portugal, Czechoslovakia, Finland, and others with what war materials they needed to keep their mobilized strength effective.

"And when the United States threw her weight into the scales of justice and sent her great army to France, that country supplied the forces of Gen. Pershing with artillery beyond number, with 57,000 machine guns, with 206,000,000 cartridges, with 22,500 rifles, with 7,600 vehicles, 807,000 gas masks, and 948,000 gas shells.

"She made possible the American Army's participation in the battle of 1918. She furnished us 3,800 cannon, 3,800 aeroplanes, 10,000,000 shells, and 240 tanks. She placed at our disposal 1,500 officers in France and sent 500 more to America as instructors; she gave us 35 cantonment zones and 17 rest camps; 30,000 hospital beds; and 300 railroad trains a day. Her advancement to us of food supplies represented a volume of weight which corresponded to 3,381,000 shipping tons.

"This in spite of her taxed strength at the Marne, wherein she saved civilization, and her supreme efforts at Verdun and in the East.

"Of the total forces mobilized by America men of French birth numbered 33,000, and more than 18,000 of these served with the American Expeditionary Forces.

"France's war debt, when liquidated, will reach $40,000,000,000, and in addition she had paid to the Allies 12,000,000,000 francs for maritime freight charges.

"At all times her efforts among the Allies were the greatest. When the armistice was signed she held 59 per cent of the line, the United States 22 per cent, and England 19 per cent. Her artillery batteries were 54 per cent of the whole, the United States' 14 per cent, and Great Britain's 32 per cent. Her aeroplane strength was 57 per cent of the total of the Allies. On all fronts in 1918 she fired 52 per cent of the total artillery shells used, and had 130 aeroplanes per every 100,000 men, as compared with 102 for Great Britain.

"What a story of achievement, my friends, and how worthy an ally for the sturdy soldiers of America. What a glow comes to us as we think of the efforts of the men beside whom the troops of Connecticut fought.

"From all over the State, and many from your own community, men served under the Stars and Stripes whose fathers fought with the heroes of France of 1870. Even from Canada Frenchmen went forth eager to be numbered among the hosts of the Allies. Of the 595,441 men mobilized by the Dominion for service a large proportion was of French stock, and French blood was spilled among her 218,433 dead. And the French Provinces of Canada helped in every way in contributing to the loans of $1,436,000,000 raised by the Dominion.

"Statistics, my friends, are sometimes cold and dry, but how the imagination thrills at these figures in realizing what a nation, fighting for liberty, can do, if need be.

"You men of the American Legion, mourning to-day your comrades, will go out to-morrow again into your place in the community. On you rests the future of the Republic. Whenever the Nation would forget your work, do not be afraid to remind them of it. You were part of the great crusade. The country owes you much. It should repay you in whatsoever it can. Nothing it can do will begin to show you its appreciation of your work.

"Keep the flag unsullied for which you fought so long. If men come among you who would tear it down and raise in its place the red flag of anarchy, cast them out from among you and tell them to return to the land they left. This is a country of free men, governing free men, with liberty under the law, where the ballot is supreme and constituted authority must render an account of its stewardship.

"Your opportunities are innumerable. Let no man, preaching false doctrines, take them from you.

"You have followed your flag to Cuba, to the border, to France, to Italy, to the plateaus of Russia. You have seen men die for it under every sky and in every clime, and you know the thrill of saluting its red, its white, and its blue at early dawn and when the setting sun casts its last gleam upon it.

"You have stood at the grave of Lafayette and said, 'We are here.'

"I salute you as Joffre did the Congress of the United States:

"'Long live France! Long live America!'"

The army of France in 1914.

TROOPS COMPOSING THE ARMY IN 1914.

In 1914 the French Army was composed of the metropolitan troops, stationed in France proper and northern Africa (Algeria, Tunis, and Morocco), and the colonial troops, of which the principal part was stationed in colonies and a secondary part kept in garrisons in France to relieve the principal part from time to time.

RECRUITMENT OF PERSONNEL.

The recruitment of the metropolitan troops had for its basic principle obligatory service with the colors for all Frenchmen of the proper age and physical ability to carry arms. The duration of this service was for a total of 28 years, composed as follows: Three years in the active army, 11 years in the active army reserve, 7 years in the territorial army, and 7 years in the territorial army reserve.

There is also a system of obligatory service with the colors in the colonial army, but in a lesser sense than carried out for the metropolitan army.

In addition to this, there was also a system of voluntary enlistments in both the metropolitan and colonial armies, whereby individuals could enlist as soldiers and could reenlist as soldiers and noncommissioned officers.

TERRITORIAL ORGANIZATION.

For the purposes of administration and recruiting, and training and grouping of the tactical units of a tactical command, France, in much the same way as the United States is divided into military departments, is divided into 21 regions, the nineteenth being in northern Africa, and the military governments of Paris and Lyons. The latter is, however, included within the fourteenth region.

In addition to the mobile tactical units assigned to these regions, there were in certain regions, principally those bordering on the frontier, what are known as "places fortes." The term "places fortes," which can not be translated, may be defined as the forts which are grouped around a fortified area of a city, such as Verdun, Toul, etc., which are of strategic value in the defense of the country.

PEACE STRENGTH OF ACTIVE ARMY (1914).

The effective total of the active army on a peace basis in July, 1914, was:

Annual contingents (classes with colors).

	Men.
Class 1911	205,000
Class 1912	210,000
Class 1913	170,000
Total of 3 classes	585,000

NOTE.—The 1914 class would not have been called to the colors until the fall had peace continued.

Permanent personnel (volunteer enlistments).

	Men.
Noncommissioned officers and privates enlisted or reenlisted in the metropolitan troops	105,000
Enlisted or reenlisted in the colonial army	25,000
Native soldiers and foreigners (in Foreign Legion) in northern Africa	36,000
Total of voluntary enlistments	166,000
Contingent (3 classes) with the colors	585,000
Total	751,000

To this should be added 29,000 officers.

TACTICAL ORGANIZATION.

In 1914 the major part of the metropolitan army was tactically organized into 21 corps, each corps being geographically located within the territorial region of similar numerical designation, the Nineteenth Corps being stationed in northern Africa.

The corps of occupation in Morocco was a provisional one, its elements being borrowed from the several permanent army corps, and particularly from the Twenty-first, located in southern France.

The general officer commanding the corps was also the commander of the territory of the region in which the corps was stationed.

In addition to the above 21 army corps there were 10 cavalry division stations in the various regions. These were not part of the several corps, but were considered as army troops.

The troops assigned to the places fortes were not part of the mobile army corps, which was stationed in the region in which the places fortes were located, but were under the general command of the general officer commanding the corps.

Before the war no peace organization higher than the army corps existed. The French started off after mobilization with 5 armies, the sixth being formed just prior to the Battle of the Marne. By the end of the war 10 armies had been organized, but the ninth had gone out of existence due to its elements having been sent to theaters other than the western front.

The army mobilized.

THE TACTICAL ELEMENT.

When on July 31–August 1, 1914, war occurred, the army as then constituted was in a position to mobilize as follows:

The 20 metropolitan army corps were complete with all their elements on mobilization. The Nineteenth Corps, stationed in Algeria and Tunis, mobilized two divisions of infantry, without having the necessary corps troops.

Each of the 20 metropolitan corps comprised two divisions, except the Sixth, which had three divisions.

One division called the Division of the Alps existed in the southeast and was independently mobilized.

From the Corps of Occupation in Morocco were borrowed and brought to France the necessary units to constitute a division.

The colonial troops stationed in France formed an army corps, with headquarters in Paris. This corps was not confined to any particular region, but was stationed at various points throughout France.

Thus with its army, its active reserve, and territorial army, France had as follows:

ARMY CORPS, ACTIVE ARMY AND ITS RESERVE.

	Men.
19 metropolitan army corps of two divisions each, there being 45,000 men per corps	855,000
1 metropolitan army corps (the Sixth) had three divisions	60,000
1 colonial army corps—two divisions	45,000
Divisions not belonging to corps:
1 division from the Alps	18,000
2 divisions from Algeria	36,000
1 division from Morocco	18,000
Total active army (47 divisions of infantry)	1,032,000

	Men.
Reserve divisions:
21 field divisions; 4 divisions for places fortes (25 divisions of infantry)	450,000
Army formations; 10 independent cavalry divisions; 10 divisions of cavalry	52,500
Army elements, heavy artillery, staffs, services, etc	187,500
Total of the active army and its reserve (10 divisions of cavalry and 72 divisions of infantry)	1,722,000

TERRITORIAL ARMY.

To the foregoing forces should be added the major territorial units formed on mobilization, viz:

	Men.
7 territorial infantry field divisions	120,000
4 territorial infantry place-command divisions	58,000
Total, 11 divisions	178,000

Outside of these units constituted from the younger classes, the territorial army furnished:

First. The principal part, and from time to time the total garrison, of the places fortes of the frontier, the seacoast, and the interior.

Second. The troops of the lines of communications formed in the rear of the army.

Third. Guards for the lines of communications, railroads, etc.

Thus France put into the field on the completion of mobilization:

Infantry divisions:
Active army	45
Colonial army	2
Reserves of the active army	25
Territorial army	11
Cavalry divisions	10
Total divisions	93

THE PERSONNEL ELEMENT.

The reserve of the active army in 1914 was composed of 11 classes (1899 to 1910, inclusive), of which the effective total, not counting the men granted a special privilege of delay, was equal to over 2,000,000 soldiers. Of this number, 800,000 were assigned to bring the units of the active army to war strength and to provide the personnel for bringing into being the two battalion reserve regiments attached to each division. The younger men of these 800,000 were assigned to units of the active army and the older men to the reserve regiments.

Six hundred thousand reservists were used to organize 25 infantry divisions, of which four divisions were for places fortes.

Therefore, of the 2,000,000 active army reservists 600,000 would still remain at the disposal of the military authorities to be used as replacements for units depleted by casualties. As a matter of fact, this number was considerably exceeded in 1914.

The 14 classes of the territorial army (1886 to 1899) at the disposal of the high command formed an effective total of more than 2,000,000 men.

Thus, with the active army and its reserves and the territorial army and its reserves, France mobilized a total of more than 5,000,000 men.

HORSES.

	Horses.
The army had at the end of July, 1914, for its use on a peace footing	175,000
It received by requisition during the beginning of the month of August	670,000
Thus the mobilized army had	845,000

ARTILLERY.

At the beginning of the war—

The artillery possessed by the French Army at the beginning of the war comprised:

Field artillery, armed entirely with 75-millimeter guns.

Mountain artillery, armed with modern 65-millimeter mountain guns.

Heavy artillery of the army, armed with modern 155-millimeter and old-model 120-millimeter guns.

Siege artillery, composed of 95, 120, 155, 220, 270 millimeter old-model guns.

NUMBER OF GUNS ON HAND.

Seventy-five millimeter field guns, a total of 4,708 guns.

Sixty-five millimeter mountain guns, a total of 96 guns.

One hundred and fifty-five millimeter rapid-fire howitzers, a total of 104 guns.

One hundred and twenty millimeter long, a total of 120 guns.

One hundred and twenty millimeter short, a total of 84 guns.

In addition to the above there were a great number of large and medium caliber old-model guns constituting the armament of the frontier and interior forts and in the artillery storehouses. The total of these amounted to more than 4,000 large-caliber and 5,000 medium-caliber guns.

There was in the course of manufacture the following amount of modern artillery:

Two hundred and twenty 105-millimeter rapid-fire guns.

One hundred and twenty Schneider gun carriages, for adapting the 155-millimeter long gun for rapid fire.

Eighteen 280-millimeter rapid-fire mortars.

But none of it was sufficiently completed to be of use at the time of mobilization.

Work on a new model 370-millimeter mortar, of which 10 were being made as test guns, had been stopped and had not been restarted on August 1, 1914.

AMMUNITION.

There had been provided for the 75-millimeter guns a total of 1,190 rounds per gun, with 200 additional rounds per gun being in the course of manufacture.

FABRICATED DURING THE WAR.

France manufactured 15,000 cannon during the war.

MACHINE GUNS.

At the beginning of the war: France had on hand at the beginning of the war 5,000 machine guns.

Manufactured during the course of the war: France fabricated during the course of the war 100,000 machine guns.

It might be of interest to note that at the beginning of the war France had 24 machine guns per division. The date of the armistice, November 11, 1918, there were in a division 133 machine guns, 441 automatic rifles, nine 37-millimeter guns, and 18 Stokes mortars.

AUTOMATIC RIFLES.

France fabricated 350,000 automatic rifles during the period of the war.

TOTAL MOBILIZATION OF PERSONNEL FOR THE ARMY DURING THE WAR.

We have seen that France mobilized at the beginning of the war about 5,250,000.

The French official figures show that a total of 8,410,000 were mobilized between the 2d of August, 1914, and December 31, 1918. These 8,410,000 were divided as follows:

Officers (of which 102,000 were produced or promoted during the war)	195,000
Other ranks	7,740,000
Natives of northern Africa	260,000
Natives of the colonies	215,000
Total	8,410,000

It has been previously shown above that about 5,250,000 were mobilized at the beginning of the war. This represented "classes," as follows:

Active army (3 classes), 1911–1913, inclusive.

Active army reserve (11 classes), 1900–1910, inclusive.

Territorial army (7 classes), 1893–1899, inclusive.

Territorial army reserve (7 classes), 1886–1892, inclusive.

Which makes a total of 28 classes mobilized at the beginning of the war.

After mobilization and to include the end of the war, the following classes were called to the colors, viz, the classes of 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918, and 1919, or 6 classes in all. This made a grand total of 34 classes called out for the war.

It has been shown that a total of 8,410,000 men were mobilized for the army.

Of this number about 5,250,000 were mobilized at the beginning of the war. This leaves 3,160,000 who joined during the war.

They are accounted for as follows:

6 classes (1914–1919, inclusive), 200,000 each	1,200,000
The remainder came from three sources, viz: (1) Colonial troops; (2) enlistments of men under or over age and foreigners; (3) recalling from retirement to active duty those who had been retired due to being partially physically unfit	1,960,000
Total	3,160,000

THE NAVY.

The French Navy mobilized a total of 245,000 men of all ranks.

MOBILIZATION OF SHIP AND DOCK YARDS.

Mention should be made in connection with the mobilization of the work of the shipyards, which had practically stopped merchant-marine construction, the result of which will cause France to use foreign shipping for many years to come.

Its dockyards, in fact, did only war work for France and her Allies and urgent repairs.

In 1918 the shipyard workers were divided as follows:

Fabrications for the minister of munitions	8,000
Fabrications for the navy	8,000
Fabrications for railways	2,000
Fabrications for the miscellaneous departments	3,000
Fabrications for the merchant marine	9,000
Total	30,000

Of the 9,000 workers assigned to the merchant-marine work, 4,500 were employed on repairs to French merchant ships, 2,500 were employed on repairs to foreign merchant ships, and 2,000 were employed on new construction.

During 1917 the dock (navy) yards delivered 30,000 to 35,000 shells a day.

One State arsenal alone manufactured during the war 10,000 vehicles of all sorts (caissons, gun carriages, etc.).

DIVISIONS.

From the beginning of and during the war: As previously shown, France had, after mobilization, 93 divisions. During the war 61 new divisions were organized, giving the French Army a grand total of 154 designated divisions. Of this total number of divisions 35 were dissolved and redistributed, so that, at the day of the armistice, France actually had under arms, in all theaters of the war, 119 divisions, made up as follows: One hundred and ten infantry divisions, 1 territorial division stationed within the limits of the military government of Paris, 2 dismounted cavalry divisions, and 6 cavalry divisions.

CASUALTIES.

The following table gives the casualties for the army and the navy. They have been taken from an official French paper on the subject:

	Officers.	Other ranks.	Natives of northern Africa.	Natives of colonies.	Total.
Army:
Deaths (all sources)	32,200	1,036,100	27,000	24,400	1,089,700
Missing	2,500	246,500	9,000	7,300	265,300
Wounded	13,700	734,000	29,300	14,700	791,700
Prisoners	.....	.....	.....	.....	438,000
Navy:
Deaths	282	5,239	.....	.....	5,521
Missing	197	5,017	.....	.....	5,214

GENERAL RECAPITULATION.

Population of France in 1914	37,797,000
Total mobilized—army and navy	8,655,000
Losses (dead and missing—army and navy)	1,365,735
Of the total wounded in the army there are:
Blind	3,405
Men who have undergone amputations	42,143

These losses represent the following approximate percentages:

3.5 per cent of the population dead and missing.

16 per cent of those mobilized for the army and navy died and missing.

57 per cent of the effectives mobilized in the active army and its reserve (aged 19 to 34 years).

MATÉRIEL EFFORT.

What France did to hasten American entry into the actual battle line.

Quoting from a French official paper—

"The American people know that which America did for France. But it is more difficult, due to the distance, of comprehending that which France did for the American Army." On this one may say a word.

She made possible the American Army's participation in the battles of 1918.

For efficient intervention in the war, which approached a decision, the great army raised by America had to be equipped, instructed, and transported to Europe from 1917 to 1918.

To be equipped in time, it was necessary that France furnish the American Army a great part of its war equipment; in particular the total of its artillery and its munitions. France thus furnished 3,834 cannon, 10,000,000 shells of all sorts, 3,800 aeroplanes, 240 tanks, thousands of machine guns and automatic rifles and other engines or machines of war of all sorts.

France placed at the disposition of the American staff 1,500 French officers in France, 500 French officers in America, 35 cantonment zones, 17 rest camps, 30,000 hospital beds, 100,000 places in private and public establishments for the sick and wounded, 300 railroad trains a day.

To gain time America utilized all its transports for men, and was obliged to call on France for millions of tons of merchandise; thus in addition France furnished 136,881 horses, 5,600,000 pounds of bread, 7,200,000 pounds of meat, 1,680,000,000 pounds of potatoes, 2,576,000 pounds of vegetables, 43,680 tons of coal, 56,000,000 pounds of firewood, 2,100,000 cubic meters of standing timber, 25,000 tons of forage, 1,900,000 liters (long quarts) of gasoline.

This made a volume and weight of matériel which corresponded to an economy of 3,381,507 shipping tons.

At the date of the armistice, of the matériel used by the American Army in the fighting line France had furnished as follows: 100 per cent of the 75-mm. field guns, 100 per cent of the 155-mm. howitzers, 100 per cent of the tanks, 81 per cent of the aviation equipment, 57 per cent of heavy artillery, 65,000,000 rounds of 75-mm. and 155-mm. ammunition which was all produced in French arsenals.

THE BATTLE OF THE MARNE.

What were the strengths of the allied and German armies engaged in the Battle of the Marne?

The above question, which is of such fundamental importance to history, is one almost impossible to answer with accuracy. The best that can be done, at least for a long time to come, is only approximate.

From an allied writer:

"The German Army, outside of its independent cavalry, had 75 infantry divisions engaged, the French had 51 infantry divisions, and the British the remnants of 6 divisions, but these were so depleted by casualties as to be only equal to, say, 3 of total strength. Thus the Germans had 75, the Allies the equal of 54 divisions, or a ratio of superiority in units in favor of the Boche of 7 to 5.

"If we neglect the casualties and take the French and German divisions at full strength, their relative numerical strengths would be approximately: German, 1,430,000; French, 1,224,000.

"This gives a numerical ratio of a little more than 7 to 6. Actually due to casualties the ratio would in all likelihood have been about 7 to 5, as was the ratio of units engaged."

From a German authority writing on the subject:

"A German authority places the number of Boche troops engaged as 950,000. This, however, is exclusive of certain troops, among which are included 60,000 east of Verdun and a number (which is not numerically stated) in the Vosges and in Alsace. It is believed that the 60,000 east of Verdun should be included, thus making their total 1,110,000."

This same writer places the strength of the allied forces as follows:

French	650,000
British	80,000
Belgian	70,000
Total	800,000

Since no Belgian troops were engaged in the Battle of the Marne, and further had their attention so seriously engaged elsewhere as to preclude any chance of it, they are removed from the allied strength, thus making it 730,000.

Thus the numerical superiority of the Boche was what 1,110,000 is to 730,000, or very close to seven-fifths, as shown above.

Therefore from the foregoing figures it appears that the relative strengths in favor of the Boche may be summed up as follows:

Ratio, 7 to 5.

Strength:

Boche, 1,110,000 to 1,430,000.

French, 730,000 to 1,224,000.

British, about 80,000, probably less.

The above figures show a wide range, but one can not do better with the data at present available.

THE BATTLE OF VERDUN.

Duration of the battle: The Battle of Verdun, which began on February 21, 1916, lasted until July 1, 1916, or 131 days.

Strength of the opposing forces:

French forces: During the period above indicated the French passed 65 divisions through the battle. Of these 65 divisions 3 were used, after a period of rest in a quiet sector, twice, making a total of 68 divisions passed through the battle. The numerical strength of these divisions, which can hardly be more than approximated, is estimated to be about 1,100,000 to 1,250,000.

German forces: The Germans passed 42½ divisions or 437 battalions through the battle. The numerical strength of these divisions with the necessary auxiliary troops was approximately 850,000 to 900,000.

SOLDIERS OF FRENCH STOCK IN THE AMERICAN ARMY.

Since the enlistment and draft-board cards, numbering some 4,000,000 or more, have not as yet been completely classified, in regard to the nativity of the American Army, the number of soldiers of French origin can only be determined by estimate. This estimate is based on the fact that nine-tenths of 1 per cent of the American population is of French origin.

Using this proportion in the number of men in the Army, viz, 3,757,624, there were 33,818 in the entire Army, either enlisted or drafted. Of this number about 18,297 served in the American Expeditionary Forces.

FINANCIAL EFFORT.

In 1913 taxes (State, Departmental, and Communal) amounted to a total of 5,651,500,000 francs. In 1918 they had increased to 11,016,500,000. This was an increase of about 100 per cent, or approximately from $30 to $60 per capita.

The general income tax voted during the war was more than doubled. While large incomes (more than 150,000 francs) are subject to a lower tax than that paid by Americans, the tax, however, is much higher on small and medium incomes (5,000 to 150,000 francs), which incomes are in the majority.

It should be remembered that this general tax is added to the scheduled taxes, which are already high, and all other contributions.

The French public debt before the war was 34,188,000,000 francs. The debt contracted during the war was, to include June 30, 1919, 162,749,000,000 francs, being composed as follows:

Floating debt, 37,917,000,000 francs, of which 1,346,000,000 francs were placed in foreign countries.

Fixed-term notes, 28,743,000,000 francs.

Consolidated debt, 72,159,000,000 francs.

Advances from banks, 23,930,000,000 francs.

It is very probable that the war debt will amount to 200,000,000,000 francs (approximately $40,000,000,000) when liquidation of all accounts has been completed.

During the war France paid a heavy tax to the Allies for merchant maritime freight charges, the total amount thus expended exceeding 12,000,000,000 francs.

THE FRENCH RAILROADS.

The French railroads on August 2 began, under the direction of the fourth bureau of the French general staff, the movement of men going to their mobilization centers.

On August 5 was begun the transportation of the different units of the several armies to their concentration centers.

Mobilization and concentration lasted until August 19, 1914. During that period outside of the men carried to mobilization points there were moved 42 army corps, each corps requiring seventy 50-car trains, or a total of 2,940 trains, which required 147,000 cars. An even larger number of trains were required for carrying individuals to their mobilization centers.

During the retreat of the army in August the State, Paris-Orleans, and Paris-Lyon-Mediterranean companies had to take care of troops, supplies, the civil population, and locomotives and cars coming from the invaded districts of France.

On September 3 the Orleans Co. carried 50,000 long-distance travelers out of Paris. The P-L-M Co. sent out more than 4,000 trains between the fifteenth and thirtieth days of mobilization. Certain regulating stations handled 200 trains a day.

From August 12 to August 20, besides the transportation for home troops, all troops coming from Algeria and Tunis via Marseilles had to be transported toward the front in three days. At the same time territorials going to Africa to replace them had to be carried in the opposite direction.

During this period, August, 1914, besides supplying concentration and mobilization trains for French troops, the West, State, and North companies transported 200,000 men of the British Army with their ammunition, matériel, and cavalry from Boulogne and St. Nazaire to the Mons-Conde front.

EFFORTS MADE BY THE RAILROADS DURING THE WAR.

The French railway companies did more than furnish transportation. In September, 1914, the Orleans Co. began to manufacture munitions of war in its works at Tours and Perigueux. The P-L-M Co. began manufacturing projectiles, wheels, and rims for army vehicles, cars, ammunition, ammunition trucks, etc. The Midi Co. also undertook the production of projectiles and various devices.

From August 1 to 20, 1914, it was necessary to suspend general traffic. It was resumed to some extent later, but the transportation of the army was always given priority.

Before the war the six big French railroad companies had approximately 14,000 locomotives, 31,000 passenger coaches, not including baggage cars, and 375,000 freight cars, of which 32,000 were for express service. The number available during the war was decreased by shortage of repair shops and by the number seized by the enemy in the invaded districts. Before the war rolling stock was increased annually by 575 locomotives and 15,000 cars of various types. None could be constructed during the war. The equipment received from England and the United States was only sufficient to replace losses due to accidents and wear. Railroad personnel before the war numbered 355,000. Mobilization decreased this number by at least 10 per cent.

In 1914 the P–L–M furnished 1,600 extra trains for troops coming from the French colonies. In 1915 it transported 70,000 Sikhs and Gourkhas from Marseilles. In 1915 the Orleans (Paris–Orleans) transported Hindu troops from Toulouse to Orleans in 400 trains, six minutes apart. The Midi transported 600,000 men and 96,000 horses and mules. The Nord Co. sent out more than 114,000 trains in 1915, average 310 per day. The Orleans Co. transported 3,700,000 men and 590,000 horses. During 1915 it supplied 30,000 trains. In 1917 it transported to Courtine and later evacuated 6,000 Russian officers and 50,000 men, requiring 70 trains and 3,800 cars. These figures do not include the hospital trains, trains for men on leave, ammunition trains needed to transport sufficient shells, the expenditure of which reached 100,000 per day in 1915 and 200,000 per day in 1916, nor trains carrying supplies of all kinds.

In 1915 the Nord moved 60,000 fully loaded trains (160 a day) for ammunition and supplies, and 18,000 empty freight trains (50 per day). In 1915 the Midi transported 617,000 tons of supplies and 584,000 of freight. In 1916 these figures were more than doubled and quadrupled. In 1915 the Orleans had to transport 11,000 guns or artillery wagons and, besides, 385,000 carloads of other commodities. The amount of raw materials, coal, and so forth, to be transported to factories was great and constantly increasing.

The six armies at first operating from Mauberge to Belfort and the seventh at Paris each had a supply center and 6 daily trains, total 42, not including trains for English Army. Between August 20 and September 30, 1914, the population of Paris, which at this time numbered 4,000,000, including troops, made it necessary for the Orleans alone to bring into Paris 117,000 tons of food, 66,000 tons of forage, 107,000 steers, 211,000 sheep and pigs for addition to the siege provisions. The five main reserve supply depots on the Etat line sent, in the eight months from August 2, 1914, to May 1, 1915, 165,000 carloads to the armies. One hundred thousand cars were necessary to restock the supplies of these depots, or an average of five or six trains daily per depot.

The movement of 3,000,000 letters per day, parcel-post parcels, magazines, periodicals, etc., required 200 cars per day, beginning with 1915.

The entrance of the United States into the war added to the difficulties of transportation. As Paris is the objective of the main lines, the transportation of troops, ammunition, and supplies across France necessitated detours, the use of branch lines, etc., and tied up the rolling stock for a longer period than would otherwise have been the case. An increasing number of American troops had to be furnished with supplies and ammunition at various points, and the shipments from the United States increased from 140,000 tons to 1,100,000 tons a month during 1918. The successful advance and occupation of enemy territory increased the length of the runs on an extended front. The regained territory was thickly populated and needed supplies of all kinds immediately. The difficulty of this is evident, when the Germans in retreating destroyed more than 1,500 bridges and 5,500 kilometers of railroad tracks.

OPERATION OF RAILROADS IN 1918.

Nineteen hundred and eighteen was the most difficult year for French railroads. The stabilization of the front had reduced the number of trains necessary for transportation of supplies and troops to 18 per day in the early part of the year (for the Nord and l'Est). When the Germans advanced in March 172 daily trains were needed to rush troops to the districts that were threatened, when but a few days before only 18 trains had been required.

The suspension of general traffic alone would not supply the additional military trains required. The number of loaded cars circulating on the Nord every day increased from 17,000 to 20,000. By the end of winter it was equal to the number in the summer of 1917 and was greater by 2,000 than that of the same period in 1917. The number of military trains expressed in kilometers grew from 1,300,000 in February to 2,000,000 in May, a figure that was not reached in 1917. The loss of lines east of Amiens and the fact that the use of this most important railroad center was prevented by enemy guns made it even more difficult for the Nord to make this extra effort. In spite of the losses of communication and equipment the transportation of troops did not slacken. A record of 198 trains in 24 hours was obtained May 5. When the tide turned in July, 1918, the railroads had to put forth still greater effort. In August, September, and October the Nord and l'Est reached their greatest efficiency. In August, 1918, the Nord had more than 25,000 loaded cars in circulation every 24 hours, a larger number than in 1917. The number of military trains expressed in kilometers remained 1,900,000 a month. During September l'Est reported 1,763,822 military trains expressed in kilometers, or more than in March, 1918.

At the same time that this immense traffic was handled the trackage abandoned by the Germans had to be repaired or rebuilt, this equaling 5,600 kilometers of track, 3,300 for the Nord and 2,300 for l'Est. In addition to this trackage 500 bridges and aqueducts, 1,100 viaducts, 12 tunnels, 3,180 kilometers of telephone and telegraph lines, 590 buildings, 150 feed tanks, 20,000 tons of metal connections, signals, and constructions other than bridges had to be rebuilt. The Germans destroyed not only the arches and metal floors of the bridges, but also the masonry or concrete piers. All switches were destroyed and the tracks for dozens of kilometers by blowing up every other rail joint or by pulling the rails from the ties by means of plows attached to locomotives. The result of this destruction made it necessary to clear everything off and supply new rails and ties.

Sending supplies to the devastated regions, Belgium, and the Rhine made still greater demands upon available rolling stock, for there was no railroad equipment in the regained territory, and on account of the condition of the roadbed the trains could travel no faster than a cart, thus tying up the cars for a long time.

During the war the lines in the interior of France, especially the P–L–M, performed a great service in bringing supplies to the munition plants and taking care of the traffic between the ports and the army zones. Beginning with 1918, this traffic, which had previously never amounted to more than 600,000 tons a week, maintained an average of about 1,000,000 tons. The German offensives of March 21 and May 27 deprived the Nord and l'Est of their best lines. Troops and supplies therefore had to be transported by the P–L–M, the Orleans, and the Etat at the very time when these lines also had to evacuate the threatened districts. It was also necessary to transport to the front a number of French and English divisions that had been in Italy, and also the troops that were coming from America. The latter arrived at the rate of 50,000 a month in the first part of the year, and then 100,000, 200,000, and 300,000 a month. The supplies required by these troops increased from 15,000 tons a day in June to 40,000 tons a day in October.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. B. ROUSE,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 20, 1920.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing two letters relative to the bill introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], which shows the propaganda to be employed in behalf of H. R. 10876:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF PERIODICAL PUBLISHERS (INC.),
New York, N. Y., February 11, 1920.

Your immediate action will help pending postal bill.

At Washington February 10 the House Post Office Committee held a hearing on the Fess bill, H. R. 10876. The case of the association was ably presented by Mr. A. J. Baldwin, of our postal committee. Other members present were: Messrs: George E. Cook, A. C. Pearson, Roger W. Allen, B. A. Mackinnon, L. D. Fernald, Fred Splitstone, V. H. Power, and Jesse H. Neal.

Briefly, the bill repeals the present progressive scale of second-class postal rates and establishes the rates in effect the first year of the existing law. While the objectionable zone system is retained, the rates are a big reduction from the rates in the existing law, and it is a movement in the right direction. Moreover, it is our belief that it is the best we can do for the present. A half a loaf is better than no bread.

The bill recognizes the present lack of adequate postal data on costs, and therefore proposes a commission of Congress to make a thorough investigation of the entire postal situation. This we believe will open up a way to obtain just consideration for all periodicals and newspapers.

The postal committee therefore urges that you write to-day to each member of the House Post Office Committee expressing your indorsement of the Fess bill, without prejudice to your belief in the unsoundness of the zone system, and ask them to report the Fess bill favorably.

The newspapers, farm papers, magazines, and other periodicals are in complete accord on the wisdom of this move.

Members of the House Post Office Committee: Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON, Minnesota; Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN, Illinois; Hon. W. G. GRIEST, Pennsylvania; Hon. CALVIN D. PAIGE, Massachusetts; Hon. HARRY C. WOODYARD, West Virginia; Hon. C. WILLIAM RAMSEYER, Iowa; Hon. ARCHIE D. SANDERS, New York; Hon. SAMUEL A. KENDALL, Pennsylvania; Hon. JAMES W. DUNBAR, Indiana; Hon. CLEVELAND A. NEWTON, Missouri; Hon. GUY U. HARDY, Colorado; Hon. HOMER HOCH, Kansas; Hon. C. ELLIS MOORE, Ohio; Hon. JOHN A. MOON, Tennessee; Hon. THOMAS M. BELL, Georgia; Hon. A. B. ROUSE, Kentucky; Hon. FRED L. BLACKMON, Alabama; Hon. EDWARD E. HOLLAND, Virginia; Hon. EUGENE BLACK, Texas; Hon. CHARLES H. RANDALL, California; Hon. HENRY M. GOLDFOGLE, New York.

Immediate action essential.

A. C. PEARSON,
Chairman Postal Committee.

AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION,
New York, February 14, 1920.

MY DEAR SIR: As you have doubtless been informed by the press reports, the House Post Office Committee this week gave two days to a hearing on the Fess newspaper-postage bill, at which the position of the publishers was strongly urged. I believe considerable progress was made, the opposition coming from the representative of the Post Office Department insisting upon increased revenue and of certain small papers, misled by a false report that the reopening of the subject meant a 4-cent flat rate.

Action by the committee on the Fess bill will be had as soon as the testimony is transcribed and printed.

There is a fair chance to secure favorable action, but only if publishers impress their views on the Members of Congress. Otherwise nothing will stop the two more postage increases provided for in the present law, and it will be almost impossible to obtain relief after this law is firmly set..

The committee is made up as follows: HALVOR STEENERSON, of Minnesota; MARTIN B. MADDEN, of Illinois; W. W. GRIEST, of Pennsylvania; CALVIN D. PAIGE, of Massachusetts; HARRY C. WOODYARD, of West Virginia; C. WILLIAM RAMSEYER, of Iowa; ARCHIE D. SANDERS, of New York; SAMUEL A. KENDALL, of Pennsylvania; JAMES W. DUNBAR, of Indiana; CLEVELAND NEWTON, of Missouri; GUY U. HARDY, of Colorado; HOMER HOCH, of Kansas; C. ELLIS MOORE, of Ohio; JOHN A. MOON, of Tennessee; THOMAS M. BELL, of Georgia; A. B. ROUSE, of Kentucky; FRED L. BLACKMON, of Alabama; EDWARD E. HOLLAND, of Virginia; EUGENE BLACK, of Texas; CHARLES H. RANDALL, of California; HENRY M. GOLDFOGLE, of New York.

No time is to be lost if you are going to do anything to help secure this legislation.

In haste.

VICTOR ROSEWATER,
Chairman Postal Committee.

The Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. S. D. FESS,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, the House is presented with one of two alternatives, either the adoption of this report, which returns the roads to the owners with ample protection of the public, or continue the political management now in vogue, which has produced the present demoralization of transportation. I am convinced that between these alternatives this body will not long hesitate. It will perform its duty to the public without fear or favor.

The special session was called May 19 to take up the appropriation bills which failed to pass in the last Congress. There were but six weeks before the end of the fiscal year in which the eight bills would have to be gotten through Congress. The last one was passed July 10. Immediately the railway bill was taken up, and the hearings opened on July 15. They continued every day, forenoon and afternoon, until September 24. An additional day was given October 4. These hearings were published in three large volumes of 3,669 pages. They constitute the finest body of the most important expert information on a great subject ever collected by any committee in the history of the Congress of the United States. The finest talent in America presented their facts and conclusions on the proposed legislation. This body of information represents every angle of transportation. No interest that made application to the committee was denied a hearing. Individual proposals were presented to the committee as bases of legislation. Weeks were consumed on hearing these arguments. These proposals touched many single and specific features of the problem, any one of which, if considered as a single proposal, would occupy the attention of Congress for weeks in final consideration. There were between 30 and 40 such individual proposals offered to the committee. All of these were given such consideration as their importance demanded. Besides these there were seven matured plans presented and urged by as many associations or interests, in which groups of interests were represented. Among these were the Plumb plan, speaking for labor; the Warfield plan, speaking for security holders; the executives' plan, speaking for the owners; the Interstate Commerce Commission plan, speaking for the Government; and others. Those plans, each one of them, from specific angles presented strong arguments for adoption. In the nature of the case neither could be adopted, and considered individually they were more or less antagonistic to one another. It was the committee's problem to draft such a measure as to include the strong points of each and omit the questionable items of each, recognizing the importance of all the interests involved, but never losing sight of the larger factor—the public. The committee proceeded on the principle that if the public was served no justifiable interest could be greatly injured.

The committee began the drafting of the measure with these points in view and reported it for committee consideration November 8. It passed the House nine days later, on November 17, after one of the most able debates ever heard on any measure. The Senate passed the Cummins bill a month later, December 19. The two measures went to conference three days later. They were considered in conference every day, including Sundays and throughout the holiday season without vacation until February 19. Considering the sharp differences between the two Houses the time was not too long. Among the many items of difference between the bills were those of credit and labor. These two were the most difficult because so vastly important. After weeks of effort to reach an agreement the conferees have reported a plan of agreement on both items which should be satisfactory to both interests, since it serves the public, which includes both the employer and employee. It duly respects the importance of credit and provides for it. It also duly respects labor and seeks to protect it. Labor should be satisfied with the provisions of the bill, which has reached a reasonable adjustment on a difficult problem that has been the subject of two recent presidential conferences without final decision. The first conference called by the President to consider labor interests broke up after three weeks of sittings without reaching any conclusion. The second conference is now in session and has been for many weeks without any final decision in sight.

Here is a piece of legislation affecting 110,000,000 people, in which labor is but one of a great many items and which proposes to adjust the interest of all classes and especially the great unorganized public. The solution of the problem of transportation involves vast interests, including $20,000,000,000 of property, representing hundreds of thousands of security holders; 2,000,000 employees, whose families will reach 5,000,000 of our people; and if we include all persons affiliated in allied industries, this transportation industry will comprise the interests of 20,000,000 people, or one-fifth of our entire population. I congratulate the country upon the work of this committee, which has in the short space of time undertaken the solution of a problem through this constructive piece of legislation and to-day presents the method by which the country can discontinue Government operation and political management of an industry second only to that of agriculture, which under the stress of war has displayed its tendency to increase the cost and decrease the service.

Members of Congress are to choose to-day between the passage of this conference committee report or the adoption of permanent Government ownership. In this alternative no one should hesitate in his decision. The bill ought to pass with little opposition, and it will pass by a safe majority in both branches of Congress. I congratulate the country upon this achievement.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LUCIAN W. PARRISH,
OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, I voted against the Esch bill last November because there were many features in it to which I strenuously objected, and for the further reason that I felt that strong opposition would cause the conferees to bring out of the conference a bill more acceptable to the public. The conference report now before the House presents a bill different in many particulars from the Esch bill, but still has many objectionable features. However, I shall vote for the conference report because I feel that its defeat at this time will result in far-reaching consequences to the American people and would mean either the return of the roads to their owners without legislation and consequently bankruptcy for many of them, or it would mean the continuation of Government control and operation, to which I am opposed. The sooner we get back to normal conditions the better it will be for the American people, and the conference report, though objectionable in some of its features, is necessarily a compromise bill and can be amended from time to time as Congress may hereafter see fit. The farmers and business men from my section of the State depend for their very life upon successful transportation facilities, and failure to have such will mean the loss of millions of dollars to them, as evidenced by the experience we have just had with Government operation, and I am supporting this measure in order to prevent the recurrence of just such conditions as these and to put an end speedily to Government control.

Federal Control of Railroads.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY J. STEELE,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, it is generally admitted that the crux of the railroad problem lies in providing adequate railroad rates. With respect to interstate transportation, it would seem that the power of rate regulation by the Federal Government is beyond serious question. It is generally conceded that Congress may lay down certain principles of rate regulation and intrust to a commission or other administrative body the duty of determining the rates which conform to these requirements, subject to a judicial review as to whether or not such rates may be confiscatory. Congress has heretofore declared that "charges for interstate transportation of passengers or property shall be just and reasonable," and to the Interstate Commerce Commission was given the authority, after having decided that a rate in force is not a proper one, "to determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable rate or rates, charge or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged." Thus the only rule for determining the rates which Congress has declared for the guidance of the commission in fixing specific rates is that they shall be just and reasonable. These very general requirements were left to the decision of the commission in each particular case, and it was thus put in the predicament that if it granted adequate rates to weak roads it would be overfeeding the strong ones. It could not establish one rate for the weak roads and another and different rate for similar service by the strong roads. It was, therefore, not surprising that such a rate-making basis led to unfortunate results and, outside of a few prosperous roads, to the demoralization of our transportation systems.

The pending bill seeks to correct this by establishipg a new basis for rate making. The question as to what constitutes a "just and reasonable" rate from the shipper's standpoint is to be determined by the necessities of transportation in the rate-making district which the commission is authorized to create. From the carrier's standpoint the question as to what it shall be permitted to retain out of its earnings above a reasonable return is also subject to regulation by the commission at the end of the transition period. During the first six months of private operation the present Government guaranties are to remain in effect. The commission is to fix rates which for at least 18 months after the termination of the Government guaranties will enable the railways in each rate-making district to earn an average return of at least 5½ per cent upon the aggregate valuation of their properties. It may in its discretion allow them to earn an additional one-half of 1 per cent, which may be invested in unproductive improvements and not capitalized. This would result in some railways earning less than 5½ per cent, and some more. Any railway which earned more than 6 per cent would be allowed to retain one-half of the surplus for its own use, and would be required to pay the other half to the Government, which would use it to build up a general railroad contingent fund, from which loans could be made to railroad companies that desired them, or equipment could be bought and leased to railroad companies. At the expiration of two years, the commission itself must determine what percentage of returns the railways shall thereafter be allowed to earn, and having done this, must so make the rates as to enable them to earn the rates fixed.

Railroad companies are carriers for hire. They are incorporated as such and given extraordinary powers in order that they may better serve the public in that capacity. They are, therefore, engaged in a public employment, affecting the public interest, and subject to legislative control as to their earnings and charges for freight and passenger service. Being public-service corporations, they are subject to legislative control in the framing of their rates, so as not to permit more than a fair return on the property used. Thus, in Wilcox against Consolidated Co., Two hundred and twelfth United States, page 21, the company had been earning and paying very large dividends, which were reduced by legislative direction to 6 per cent upon the fair value of its property. In that case the court said:

> Taking all facts into consideration, we concur with the court below on this question, and think complainant is entitled to 6 per cent on the fair value of its property devoted to public use.

So, also, the classification of railroads for the purpose of determining rates has been sanctioned by the courts. Such classification operates uniformly in each district, not because it so operates upon all persons in the country, for it does not, but because every person who is brought within the relation and circumstances provided for is affected by the law. It is general and uniform in its operation upon all persons in a like situation, and the fact of its being general and uniform is not affected by the number of persons within the scope of its classified operation. Whenever a company or person comes within any class or district, it has all the rights given to any other company or person in that class or district. Thus, in Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Co. against Iowa, Ninety-fourth United States, page 155, a classification was held to be reasonable and proper which divided the railroads into classes according to gross earnings per mile, and permitted the different classes to charge different rates. In that case the court said:

> It is very clear that a uniform rate of charges for all railroad companies in the State might operate unjustly upon some. It was proper, therefore, to provide in some way for an adaptation of the rates to the circumstances of the different roads; and the general assembly, in the exercise of its legislative discretion, has seen fit to do this by a system of classification. Whether this was the best that could have been done is not for us to decide. Our province is only to determine whether it could be done at all and under any circumstances. If it could, the legislature must decide for itself, subject to no control from us, whether the common good requires that it should be done.

In the Minnesota Rate case (230 U. S., 433), Justice Hughes, in considering the interblending of operations in the conduct of interstate and local business by interstate carriers, and the exigencies that arise with reference to the maintenance of interstate rates by reason of their relation to intrastate rates, said:

> But these considerations are for the practical judgment of Congress in determining the extent of regulation necessary under existing conditions of transportation to conserve and promote the interests of interstate commerce.

In section 422 of the bill, a new section to be known as section 15–A to the interstate-commerce act, sets forth the necessity for the new basis of rate making as follows:

> 5. Inasmuch as it is impossible (without regulation and control in the interest of the commerce of the United States considered as a whole) to establish uniform rates upon competitive traffic which will adequately sustain all the carriers which are engaged in such traffic, and which are indispensable to the communities to which they render the service of transportation, without enabling some of such carriers to receive a net railway operating income substantially and unreasonably in excess of a fair return upon the value of their railway property, held for and used in the service of transportation, it is hereby declared that any carrier which receives such an income so in excess of a fair return shall hold such part of the excess as hereinafter prescribed as trustee for and shall pay it to the United States.

The payment to the United States, however, is in trust for the transportation purposes above mentioned.

The power of Congress to direct such use of excess earnings thus produced is challenged on the ground that if the rates charged by the carrier are just and reasonable they are the private property of the carrier, and if unreasonable it would deprive shippers and passengers of their property without due process of law. Is it, then, within the power of Congress to divide the railways into rate-making districts and establish rates on a group basis, directing that any excess earnings beyond a reasonable return be used to sustain transportation in the group as a whole and impress such excess earnings with a trust as set forth in the section above quoted? The question whether a law deprives a party of rights secured by the Federal Constitution depends not upon how it is characterized but upon its practical operation and effect. Congress being empowered to regulate commerce among the several States and to pass all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution any of the powers specifically conferred, may make use of any appropriate means for the same.

Within the scope of the word "regulation," as used in the commerce clause, is embraced the idea of fixing the compensation which the owners of railroad property shall receive for the use thereof. Generally speaking, what the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience. On the other hand, what the public is entitled to demand is that no more be exacted from it for the use of a public highway than the services rendered by it are reasonably worth. It is manifestly a question for Congress to determine whether or not the regulations adopted are the best to promote the public interest. All that the courts have to consider in passing upon its constitutionality is as to whether it is calculated in any appreciable degree to advance the constitutional end involved. It is a settled principle of constitutional law that the Government which has a right to do an act and has imposed upon it the duty of performing that act must, according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select the means, and those who contend that it may not select any appropriate means, that any particular mode of effecting the object is excepted, take upon themselves the burden of establishing that exception. In the present instance this burden has been met by the mere characterization of the rate-making basis selected by Congress as a violation of the right of private property without the citation of any specific judicial authority to sustain the charge.

The control of interstate commerce having been granted to the Federal Government without limitation, the grant is, according to the general principle governing the interpretation of grants of Federal power, construed to be plenary. Such control is not confined to the instrumentalities of commerce or the postal service known or in use when the Constitution was adopted, but keeps pace with the progress of the country and adapts itself to the new developments of time and circumstance, as the new agencies are successively brought into use to meet the demands of increasing population and wealth. And with reference to the fifth amendment, which forbids the taking of private property for public use without just compensation or due process of law, the Supreme Court has said:

> That provision has always been understood as referring only to direct appropriation and not to consequential injuries resulting from the exercise of lawful power. It has never been supposed to have any bearing upon or to inhibit laws that indirectly work harm and loss to individuals. A new tariff, an embargo, a draft, or a war may inevitably bring upon individuals great losses, may indeed render valuable property almost valueless. They may destroy the work of contracts.

It may be added that if this principle be not sound, the result would be that individuals and corporations could by contracts between themselves, in anticipation of legislation, render of no avail the exercise by Congress, to the full extent authorized by the Constitution, of its power to regulate commerce. No power of Congress can be thus restricted.

In the section quoted, Congress declares that in order to maintain lines of transportation for the convenience of the public it is necessary to establish rates that will produce a fair return on the aggregate value of the railroad property in the rate-making district. The public surely has an interest in the maintenance of these transportation facilities. It is a deliberate enactment declared to be necessary to meet conditions which actually exist. There is no express prohibition upon the right of regulation by Congress to establish rates with reference to aggregate or average conditions. Congress declares it to be impracticable to estimate the cost or value of each railway service. If the practicable method adopted by Congress produces an excess as to particular lines but necessary to maintain all the lines in a rate group, is that beyond its constitutional powers? Clearly this excess is still devoted to a public purpose and within the power of Congress. It does not interfere with past earnings but simply regulates future earnings and impresses these earnings with a public trust. As supervisory trustee of the public rights, under its express power of regulation, the Government asserts its power so as to give to all the people of a rate-making district the assured maintenance of their transportation lines. It is established by a series of cases that an ulterior public advantage may justify a comparatively insignificant taking of private property for what, in its immediate purpose, is a private use, and also that the share of each party in the benefit of a scheme of mutual protection is a sufficient compensation for the correlative burden he is compelled to assume.

These principles have been applied to private property whenever in any way affected with a public interest, and apply with greater force to railroad corporations because they are engaged in a public employment. The provisions of the bill I have discussed are, in my judgment, a reasonable exercise of the power of regulation vested in Congress to promote the interests of interstate commerce.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS T. McFADDEN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

PERSONAL RURAL CREDIT.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the rural credit bill I introduced to-day provides for the establishment of a cooperative system of farm credit based on personal security, as distinguished from land-mortgage security.

This bill is an adaptation of the best features of the European systems to meet the conditions in this county. It follows the Credit Agricole of France in limiting the activities of the proposed system to the use of bills of exchange, or to "banking with bills," as distinguished from the system of "banking with deposits," thus broadening the market for productive agricultural paper, reducing the expense of management, and improving our whole banking or credit system.

The bill provides for 1 central bank, 48 branches, 1 for each State, and innumerable local associations or communes. The central bank will have a capital of $25,000,000, to be furnished by the Government, but a sinking fund is created to reimburse the Government for the capital so advanced by it. Each branch will have a capital of $50,000, to be furnished by one of the big life insurance companies. This capital will carry with it the right to elect the auditor and deputy auditors of the rural-credit society, and will be paid an annual dividend of 6 per cent. The stock of the communes or community associations will have a par value of $5, which will be subscribed for and carried by the farmer members of the system. Both limited and unlimited liability communes are provided for, but only members of the unlimited-liability communes will exercise a voice in control.

DEPOSIT BANKING INADEQUATE FOR MANY AGRICULTURAL NEEDS.

Deposit banking does not meet many of the productive requirements of agriculture. I believe I am entitled to speak on this subject, as I have spent my whole life in deposit banking. To illustrate the inadequacy of our present banking or credit system, let us take the cattle-breeding industry. It is 9 months before a cow calves, and 15 to 21 months more before that calf may be converted into beef. Altogether, it requires from 2½ to 3 years before that credit will reproduce itself. It also requires about the same time for credit used to build a silo to reproduce itself. That is not safe business for a deposit banker, whose borrowed capital is payable principally on demand. But this business is done with perfect safety by European rural-credit systems doing open-market operations. Our beef production is not keeping pace with the increase in our population or industrial activities, and unless we provide adequate credit machinery to meet the requirements of that industry we may expect even higher beef prices than we now have. No animal is such a consumer of farm roughage as the cow, and the advancement of that industry means increased soil fertility.

THE MARKET FOR THIS FARM PAPER.

It may be asked, and properly so, where will be the market for such paper. This market, like the market for every other commodity, must be developed through sound business methods. The wage earners of our industrial centers and many of our corporations should carry it, and they would do so if it were properly presented to them. I maintain that our life insurance companies should carry at least $1,000,000,000 of such paper to meet the banking obligations under their guaranteed cash surrender value policies. And this applies with equal force to the policies issued by the Government under the war-risk insurance act. The average maturity of this farm paper will be about 11 months, and the banking obligations of the insurance companies are payable at the end of the policy year, or every twelfth month. It is obvious, then, that this paper just meets the banking obligations of those institutions. By carrying a line of this liquid paper, our life insurance companies would not be forced to throw their permanent investments on the market during a financial crisis.

NEED OF COOPERATION FOR CONSERVATION OF CAPITAL.

The prime object of a bank is to economize capital, but actual practice does not always square itself with this theory, and the result is a waste of banking capital. The present shortage of capital is a world-wide condition, and it behooves us all to strain every point to relieve it. The cooperative feature of this bill, as well as the use of "bills" instead of "deposits" will tend greatly in economizing banking capital. To borrowers it makes no difference from what source the borrowed capital is raised, but to the investing public it makes all the difference whether the borrowers be treated as partners or creditors. To illustrate this, let us suppose the proposed system does $1,000,000,000 of business, one-half the borrowed capital being raised from the partners—farmer commune stockholders—and the balance in the open market. If that business were done under the "deposit" system, there would be $27,400,000 of capital to secure $1,000,000,000 of loans, whereas under the proposed system there would be $527,400,000 of capital to secure $500,000,000 of borrowed capital, not taking into consideration the security furnished by the individual borrowers, which would exceed $1,000,000,000, nor the security afforded under the cooperative feature, which would be considerably more.

REPLY TO SECRETARY HOUSTON'S LAST REPORT.

In his last report as Secretary of Agriculture Secretary Houston called attention to the need for improved personal rural-credit facilities, but suggested this reform should come through State legislation. If the States undertake this, it will mean the placing of our farmers in deposit banking, a strictly local system which is now overdone in this country, is too expensive, and would not afford so broad a market for productive farm paper as would a system employing written credit instruments—call them bills of exchange, short-time notes, or what not. Investors in our industrial centers would not have the confidence in the paper of a corporation created by a legislative body in which they had no voice as one created by a legislative body in which they had an equal voice with the sellers of such paper. Not only would the proposed system be safer and far more efficient for the farmers but it would tend to improve our whole banking system and rid it of many existing abuses caused by an attempt to do a class of business it is not designed to do and can not safely do; and if the farmers employ the same credit machinery now used by the existing banks, they will make matters worse, which will result in the breaking down of our whole credit system.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12678) to create a rural credit society and general insurance league to facilitate the increase and reduce the cost of farm production and act as the fiscal and financial agents for the Government of the United States, to create two such agents, and for other purposes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARION E. RHODES,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, before discussing the merits of House bill 10453, the so-called railroad bill, I desire to make some general observations.

A few days ago on the floor of the House, in discussing the question of river and harbor improvement, I stated that the greatest domestic question before the American people at this time is the transportation problem. To-day Congress is engaged in an effort to prescribe the rules and regulations under which the railroads are to operate in the future. It might be interesting to briefly note in this connection the early history of legislation relating to railroad-rate regulation and railroad building. Twenty years ago the question was, Should the Government regulate transportation by fixing rates, fares, and charges, or should that matter be left entirely in the hands of the carriers themselves? Railroad people generally were agreed the Government should not interfere in the matter of railroad control, and many argued Congress had no authority under the Constitution to go that far. In fact, the man who advocated the right of Government supervision of railroads at that time was regarded as a reformer, advocating a species of socialism. But the radical of that time is the conservative of to-day, because everybody concedes not only the right of the Government to exercise such control, but the necessity as well.

The celebrated Herbert Hoover is reported in the newspapers a few days ago to have said, "This will be the last chance for the railroads to make good, and if they fail Government ownership is the inevitable result."

I did not agree with Mr. Hoover on some of the things he did in connection with the late war, especially when he made us eat a mixture of corn meal and wheat bran after the armistice was signed while he sent our flour to Europe, yet I fully agree with him in what he had to say concerning the future conduct of the railroads.

So, whether we favor Government ownership or whether we oppose it, the fact remains we are tending in that direction, and much will depend upon the railroads themselves as to what the result will be in that regard.

Let me say here that while I shall vote against this bill I shall do so because I believe it will work a hardship upon the people if enacted into law, and not because I want to punish the railroads for any of their shortcomings in days past and gone.

I rather like the great transcontinental railways of our country for what they have done for civilization. We must not forget the fact that the builders of railroads in the early days were among the honored pioneers of this country. We must not forget the fact also that in a great majority of instances the pioneer builders of railroads not only encountered great difficulties but found themselves the most gigantic financial failures the country ever saw.

That building railroads was a hazardous business in the early days there is no doubt; and because it was a hazardous business the railroads, or, I should say, the builders of railroads, appealed to the Federal Government to aid them in their endeavors. They also appealed to State governments, county governments, and municipal governments. The basis of their appeal was that the building of railroads was a public necessity, therefore the public ought to contribute of its land and money. Federal, State, county, and municipal Governments accepted the explanation given by the railroads and contributed liberally.

It is authentically estimated that the Federal Government gave the railroads from time to time enough of its public land to make five great States equal in area to Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Ohio, and Indiana. State governments and county governments and municipal governments all gave liberally to the railroads of their money and property. Some of the counties in my own State (Missouri) gave so liberally the people have yet outstanding railroad debts. One county (St. Clair County, Mo.) is said to have been required to hold its sessions of the county court in the woods since the Civil War until last year, when the matter was settled by compromise in order that the county judges might escape going to jail for refusing to recognize an old railroad debt.

I take it this review of the history of railroad building in this country brings us face to face with the fundamental right of the Government to at least exercise a restraining influence over the railways and transportation companies engaged in the interstate commerce of our country.

The transportation question is one that lies close to all the people. It affects every individual, every community, and all parts of the country either directly or indirectly. Both capital and labor are mutually dependent upon transportation in the production of wealth.

It is not only important that lines of transportation be established, but it is important that after they are established the rates should be just and the service adequate.

The community which is denied the opportunity to move its products to market at fair rates and upon an even footing with a competing community must inevitably suffer great loss. Therefore the very growth, development, and prosperity of every community to a very marked degree depends upon the transportation of the products of the community at large.

The truth is, the founders of our Republic saw at the very outset it was necessary to provide a means of regulating commerce, and at the same time they saw the necessity of fixing a basis of equality and uniformity among the several States in the transportation of their goods, wares, and merchandise. We have to go to no other source for authority on which to base this argument than the Constitution of the United States, because it is therein ordained that the Congress of the United States shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

I now call attention to some of the objectionable features of the bill.

I am fundamentally opposed to the 5½ per cent guaranty by the Government to the railroads on the book value of their property. The book value of the railroads in the United States is $19,000,000,000. Five and one-half per cent of $19,000,000,000 is $1,045,000,000. This means that Congress, by the terms of this bill, binds the American people to provide the railroads for the next two years with the sum of $1,045,000,000 annually in addition to the $300,000,000 loan. How is this money to be raised? It can only be raised, under the provisions of this bill, by the Interstate Commerce Commission at once raising freight and passenger fares. There is no doubt but the people will be required to pay higher freight and passenger rates if this bill becomes a law. This is conceded by friends of the measure, and defended upon the ground that the railroads, to use the language of this morning's Washington Post, "are ruined, demoralized, and disorganized." If my recollection is correct, the railroads were ruined, demoralized, and disorganized at the time the Government acquired control. No man in Missouri knows this to be true any better than myself. In 1914, in a personal suit, reported in volume 270 of the Missouri Supreme Court Report, page 547, entitled "The State ex rel. M. E. Rhodes v. Public Service Commission and Chicago & Alton Railroad Co., appellants," I opposed every interstate line of railroad in Missouri—14 in all—in their effort to raise freight and passenger rates above those fixed by law. At that time over half of these lines were in the hands of receivers, including such roads as the Missouri Pacific, the Frisco, the Rock Island, and Wabash.

Mr. B. F. Bush, in 1914 president of the Missouri Pacific, now regional director of that system, in an argument before the Public Service Commission of Missouri, as a plea for higher rates, said that bankruptcy was staring the railroads in the face and that the sheriffs were already knocking at their doors. I mention this to remind Congress and the country that the ruined, demoralized, and disorganized condition of the railroads to-day, which I admit is largely true, was also true before Government control. The railroad-paid newspapers of the country are seeking to conceal the prewar condition of the railroads by magnifying present conditions. They also undertake to prejudice the public in favor of this bill by holding out the opposition of railway employees to the so-called labor board section of the bill. To my mind the so-called railroad labor board provided for in this bill, and which is opposed by the employees, is the least objectionable provision in the bill. I base my objection to this bill chiefly upon other grounds. However, I concede the employees are justified in objecting to the bill upon those grounds, and do not blame them for it. I believe, if I were an owner of railroad stock I would also object to section 306 of this bill, because owners of railroad stock, as well as employees belonging to organized labor, are prohibited from membership on the railroad labor board. My opinion is, if this board is to be created at all, the owners of railroad stock, organized labor, and the public should be equally represented upon the board. Therefore, as section 306 now stands, it is a snare and a delusion, and if I had my way about it I would strike out the entire section.

I am also opposed to the $300,000,000 loan provided for in section 210. How can the Government loan the railroads this great sum of money at this time, when we can not even pay the soldier boys a bonus? We haven't got it. But it is said the roads are broke and must have the money. My answer to this is, the Government has not the money to loan, and if the roads must have it, they can get it from the banks and from private capital. Let no man dispute the assertion that there is abundant private capital for this purpose. Mr. Henry F. Davidson, of New York fame, is now in Europe trying to finance an international corporation of some sort to be used in conjunction with the League of Nations in financing the world. Why do not some of these philanthropists help out at home?

Under the refunding provisions of this bill, the $300,000,000 loan provided for may run 10 years. My guess is to-day, that if this bill passes Congress will be asked not only to increase the loan within the two-year period, but will be asked to extend the 5½ per cent guaranty period to not less than five years. In short, this bill means that the Government is asked to underwrite the railroad business, and I am not in favor of doing it. This bill is fearfully and wonderfully made.

In conclusion, let me say Congress does not have to pass this bill in order that the railroads may go back to their owners. Under the terms of the Federal control act, the act of August 29, 1916, and the President's recent proclamation, the railroads go back to their owners March 1, 1920, whether we pass this bill or not. There has never been a greater piece of intentional humbuggery put over on the American people than the claim by the railroads and the friends of this bill, that if this bill is not passed the railroads can not be returned to their owners. Some people may believe this, but I know better. In my opinion this is what should be done, and all that should be done. Let the railroads go back automatically under the President's proclamation and existing law. Then let the railroads figure out exactly how much the Government of the United States owes them, and present their demand. When that is done I am ready to vote for the passage of a bill to pay them. That is all the Government intended to do in the first place, and all it has ever agreed to do.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HALVOR STEENERSON,

OF MINNESOTA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920,

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, the railroads were taken over by the Government as a war necessity, and the President has by proclamation ordered them returned to their owners on March 1 next.

During Government operation and control the compensation of railroad employees has been increased, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars per annum, and other expenses of operation have likewise increased. To compensate for these increased expenses, freight rates have increased more than 25 per cent and passenger rates nearly 50 per cent, and yet even with these increased rates the Government, it is stated, has, during the period of Federal control, lost more than $800,000,000, and we have loaned them over $900,000,000. The increased railroad passenger and freight rates are only effective during Government control, and if the railroads should be returned on March 1 next without legislation, most, if not all of them, would face bankruptcy and would have to go into the hands of receivers. This would probably mean a general panic and possible disaster throughout the whole country. Clearly, then, it is our duty to make provision by law for the return of the railroads in such a way that they can function and serve the people efficiently. As the railroads were taken over as a war measure, when the war ceases we are in duty bound to return them.

I have given this bill some thought and I believe every fair-minded man who understands it will agree in the opinion that it is a great piece of constructive legislation. Time will not permit to examine the many features of the bill. The main point about it is that it establishes a strict Government control of the operation of the railroads, both as to financing and as to transportation charges. It will do away with the water stock for the future, one of the things that has brought the railroads into disfavor and disrepute in the past. It preserves, so far as is necessary in the public interest, the autonomy of the States and their control over local matters.

I have read and reread the labor provisions of the bill and I am unable to find anything unfair to the workmen. I have no reason whatever to vote for any measure that would be unfair to railroad labor. I count many of the laboring men as acquaintances and friends. I would do nothing to injure them. The bill provides for the method of voluntary arbitration. There is no penalizing of strikes. The antistrike provision of the original Cummins bill is not there. In labor disputes it makes it possible to have a determination by representatives chosen by the contending interests. The public is protected, and I believe that the plan devised will operate with success. I believe that experience will demonstrate the wisdom and practicability of these provisions of the bill. I have received many letters and pamphlets, both for and against this bill, and I have received representatives of labor organizations; I have listened to them with attention and sympathy. I have tried to approach the questions involved with an open mind to do what was right, not only to labor, but to all the people. The real objection, however, that has been urged against this bill is based upon the theory that public ownership and operation of railroads is preferable. It has been strongly urged that the people are in favor of Government ownership, but no referendum or vote has ever been taken on the question. Neither the Republican nor Democratic Party, either in National, State, or district, have ever had a plank in their platforms in its favor. The last Republican platform, among other things, contained this plank:

The entire transportation system of the country has become essentially national. We, therefore, favor such action by legislation or, if necessary, through an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will result in placing it under complete Federal control.

This is the last official expression so far as that party is concerned. If the people really desire Government ownership and so express themselves, I see no reason why the Representatives should not vote for it, but until they do, it seems to me it would be a breach of confidence on the part of a Representative elected by either of those parties to vote for it. In addition to taking over the railroads the Government also took over the telegraph and telephones as a war measure, and I favored their return, and this Congress passed the necessary legislation for that purpose. The same reasons that impelled that action are controlling with reference to the question now before us. I can not, therefore, escape the conclusion that it is our bounden duty to adopt this conference report and let this bill become a law.

Federal Control of Railroads.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. McKINLEY,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920,

On the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, if you favor Government ownership vote to defeat this bill. If you believe in private ownership and operation vote for this bill.

If I were an owner of railroad bonds I would want Government ownership. As a taxpayer and user of railroads I prefer private ownership.

We are at the parting of the ways. We must decide with this bill whether we want the railroads owned and operated by the Government or whether we want them owned and run under private control. If the latter, the Government is to fix the value of their property, name the rate of interest, prescribe the freight rates, and compel the roads to pay good wages to the employees. This I understand to be the purpose of this bill.

Very properly the strike clause has been eliminated. This change is right. The strike clause was not workable. In every condition of life, in the churches, in the schools, in business, men's opinions do not always coincide, and it is necessary to give and take—to yield part of our own opinion or contention in order that the peace, good will, and the business of the world may go quietly along. This situation can only be brought about by arbitration. In fact, that is the real purpose of our courts. Differences between citizens arise which they can not settle between themselves. One side or both appeals to the court. The court hears the evidence and decides. In the case of an appeal to the court the decision is final and the citizen must accept. This is not so in this railroad bill. There is no compulsion. If any of the organizations to whom any of the railroad employees belong are not satisfied with their pay, they have full power to demand an increase. If same is denied they may demand a full hearing by the board of arbitration. If they are not satisfied with the decision they may strike. What plan can be more fair to an employee? Under this plan the railroads are compelled to make a full showing of conditions, they can conceal nothing, and if an increase is granted the railroads are bound by law to pay same even if it bankrupts them to do so.

On the other hand, the employees are not bound to accept the decision if it is unsatisfactory and can go on a strike to enforce their greater demand.

I regret to see expressions by certain classes of newspapers, and also occasionally by a Congressman, of a desire to confiscate railroads. There are outstanding in the United States 40,000,000 life-insurance policies, policies owned by you and by me for the purpose of protecting our loved ones in case death comes to us. I wonder if these people who so glibly talk of confiscation, or, what is the same thing, cutting off the railroads' power to earn interest, realize that the security back of his insurance policy is in a large part railroad mortgages? About one-fourth of all railroad bonds are owned by savings banks and insurance companies.

Objection is made by the opponents of this bill, many of whom doubtless favor Government ownership, to the clause which provides—for two years only—a guaranty of 5½ per cent interest upon the value of the property. Remember, this interest rate is 5½ per cent, not on watered stock, but upon the real value of the property.

How is this value to be ascertained? Is it to be named by the railroads? No. It is to be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. This commission is appointed by the President of the United States. In the past its decisions have been friendly to the public and not to the railroads. Their valuations will wipe out all water in railroad property. To-day when 4¼ per cent tax-free bonds of the United States are selling below par it will be admitted that 5½ per cent is a very low rate of income in general business, as at least one-third of this income from railroad bonds must be repaid in city, State, and Federal taxes.

Now, we have come to the point where, in my mind, we must decide whether we will have private ownership and operation under Government supervision or whether we will have railroad bankruptcy and, of necessity, Government ownership. The population of the United States grows at the rate of 2 per cent a year. All the people and every industry are absolutely dependent upon efficient railroad service. Efficient service and prompt freight distribution are vital. Without them our present civilization would collapse. One hundred years ago my grandfather, upon a southern Ohio farm, with his family of eight children, felt no need of railroads. They cut their trees for fuel; spun the wool grown upon the backs of their own sheep for clothing; they raised their own tobacco; took their wheat to the mill to be ground; they dried their own fruit and sorted their own vegetables. Even their shoes and boots were made by the village cobbler from hides taken off the backs of their own cattle.

To-day the dweller in the towns, comprising two-thirds of the population, is dependent upon the railroads for everything. Even the farmer—outside of fruit, vegetables, and salt pork—must come to the railroad station for every necessity. Ten years ago James J. Hill, the wisest railroad builder of all time, said that in order to keep up with the demands of the population that the railroads of the country must spend $1,000,000,000 every year of new money for additional track, terminals, cars, and engines on account of the strangling policy of the Interstate Commerce Commission; the railroad credit was so impaired they could not borrow the money to make this expenditure. Consequently we suffered from the awful railroad breakdown when the stress of war came upon us. It is now estimated that $6,000,000,000, an amount practically one-half of the present mortgage debt of the 250,000 miles of railroads of the country, will be needed to rehabilitate the railroads, rebuild and extend the necessary track, add to the present terminals, and buy more cars and engines to cover the demands for the convenience of the people during the next five years. This $6,000,000,000, over one-fourth the bonded debt of the whole United States Government, about half the present mortgage debt of the railroads, must be obtained by the railroads from the people through the sale to the people of railroad securities. The railroads when they go to the private investor in the money market must come in competition with the man that wants to borrow money to build a house, enlarge a factory, to start a bank, or to increase a growing business. The notes of the railroads must be as attractive as to interest and as sure of repayment as to principal as the notes of the concerns in other business. If there is any question as to the ability to repay both principal and interest, the savings of the people will not go into the new railroad securities. If the billions of money needed can not be borrowed, the railroads will go into bankruptcy and the Government will be compelled to take them over to rehabilitate them. Unless the railroads are allowed sufficient earnings to establish their credit, all this will happen just as sure as 2 and 2 make 4.

In closing, let me again repeat that the interest of 5½ per cent guaranteed is not upon a value set by the railroads but a value fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission is appointed by the President of the United States.

The Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY Z. OSBORNE,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, the considerations which appear to me to be controlling upon the question of the return of the railroads to their owners may be stated briefly as follows:

In 1917 our Nation found itself a party in a great World War. It was of the utmost importance that the administration in charge of the American forces should be accorded the most sweeping powers in order to put the full physical strength of the country into the contest. As a Member of the House of Representatives I am glad, and shall always be glad, that I voted on every occasion for the granting of such powers to the President. These grants of power were, however, in most cases accompanied by a direct statement in the statutes adopted that they were given for the period of the war, and for that period only; that they would be returned to the people when the emergency passed. In every expression of mine upon this floor stating the reasons for my votes to extend these extraordinary powers I laid stress upon their temporary character and the intention that they should cease at the appropriate time.

One of these sweeping powers was the taking over of the transportation service. It was highly important, in order that the transportation of troops, supplies, and munitions of war should be paramount, that the railway lines should be taken over by the Government. I fully approved that policy and believe it was a potent factor in making possible the transporting overseas of 2,000,000 men, with supplies and equipment, in a few months. That this Government employment of the railways embarrassed private shipments and passenger service is, as we all know, true. But it is to be remembered that those who had charge of the railways had a stupendous task, and it was impossible for them to proceed in matters of individual judgment without causing such inconveniences and without in some cases—perhaps in many—making serious mistakes. Mistakes will always occur where action is taken summarily and decisions made instantly, as must be the case in time of war.

It must be remembered, however, that the railways in this country are property owned by some one. When the Government took possession of the railways it became morally bound to see that their owners did not suffer a greater loss than was absolutely necessary. This obligation would, in my opinion, extend to the return of this property to its owners, upon the passing of the emergency, in as nearly as possible the condition in which it was received; if returned in a worse condition, the damage to private owners should be compensated for.

Now that the war is over, it seems to me that good morals and honesty require that the avowed intention of the Government to restore this property to its owners ought presently to be fulfilled. The President publicly stated nearly a year ago that it was his intention to return the railroad properties to their owners on the first of the present year. Subsequently he changed the date to the 1st of March, 1920.

The bill under consideration is the best work of the great committees of the Senate and House of Representatives which have had the matter of this return in charge. It may not be perfect, and doubtless is not perfect. It is, however, the result of the best endeavors of the experienced legislators of the Congress.

The question of whether the railroads should be owned and conducted by the Government or managed under some such plan as that known as the Plumb plan is aside from the question here at issue. These may properly be considered later on their merits and unconnected with this act of plain honesty now to be fulfilled by the passage of this bill. As to Government ownership, personally I have not reached a full conclusion. The experiences with handling the railroads during the war would induce a conclusion adverse to Government ownership. In fairness, however, it must be said that the handling of the railways during this period has been so influenced and controlled by the necessities of war that it is hardly a fair test. In any event, however, the question is a separate one, and the seizure of the railways by the Government as a war measure ought not to be taken advantage of to foster any theories for or against the principle of Government ownership.

It is of great importance that the railways should be returned under such terms as to fortify their credits and make possible the raising of the necessary funds whereby to restore their depleted equipment and the physical condition of their roads, which has unquestionably run down during the war, and also to make possible the extension of their facilities to meet the requirements of our expanded commerce. The financial provisions of this bill are intended for that purpose. The best financial authorities hold that these provisions are not too favorable to the companies, and, indeed, many believe them not favorable enough. We who are not expert in these matters are inclined to accept the judgment of the able members of the committees who have reached the solution here proposed.

I presume that there are few Members who have not received many communications on all sides of the labor question. I certainly have. It is not surprising that labor organizations, as well as their opponents, should be very earnest in this matter, and that the language in which their views are expressed often should be extreme. I have received from both sides telegrams and communications of a threatening nature. In the circumstances in which these were sent it would seem nearer their intent to call them messages of warning. For myself I will say of these messages that I do not resent them, because the moving nature of their subject may excuse intemperate expressions; but, without reference to such warnings or threats, I shall be guided, as I endeavor to be guided with respect to all votes which I cast here, by my honest conviction founded upon careful consideration of all the facts and arguments before me, in the light of what I believe to be just and right and for the Nation's good, trusting that such action will in the long run meet the approval of the average public opinion, which is usually just.

Guided by these considerations I shall cast my vote in favor of the conference report upon the railroad bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM F. STEVENSON,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920,

On the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much my inability to vote for the report of the conference committee on the railroad bill. I am exceedingly anxious to avoid the possibility of Government ownership in any form and would sacrifice a good deal to enact legislation that would effect the proper return and rehabilitation of the railroads, but there are a number of insuperable objections in the bill, some of which I will name—quite a number of which I will not enumerate, as those which I name are absolutely insurmountable from my standpoint.

First. In section 407, subdivision 2, it is provided that the Interstate Commerce Commission may permit the acquisition by one carrier "of the control of any other such carrier or carriers, either under a lease or by the purchase of stock, or in any other manner not involving the consolidation of such carriers under a single system for ownership and operation." South Carolina's constitution and statutes absolutely prohibit the acquisition by one railroad corporation of any competing or parallel line within the State under any circumstances. This national authority gives the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to allow, for instance, the Southern Railway to acquire and control every foot of railroad in South Carolina, and thereby monopolize the whole business and destroy every vestige of competition, and writes off the book South Carolina's constitutional and statutory provisions on that subject.

Second. In paragraph 6 of section 407 it is provided that, after a hearing before the commission in which the railroads concerned and the governor of the State shall have a hearing, the Interstate Commerce Commission can authorize any two railroads to consolidate, "and thereupon such consolidation may be effected, in accordance with such order, if all the carriers involved assent thereto, the law of any State or the decision of any State authority to the contrary notwithstanding." The constitution and statutes of South Carolina have forbidden the consolidation of competing or parallel lines of railroads in South Carolina. This authority absolutely and expressly overrides that power and allows them to consolidate openly, boldly, and defiantly in the face of the organic law of my State, and I decline to vote to repudiate that fundamental law which is written in wisdom for the protection of the public of South Carolina.

I will not enumerate the other objections, because, while they are very powerful, they are not so fundamental as these, and these are sufficient to deter me, as a loyal South Carolinian, from voting for this measure and slapping my State in the face. Since the roads may be returned whether this law is passed or not, I will stand on the law as it is and vote against this report.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALLEN T. TREADWAY,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 23, 1920.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, a brief account of the reasons leading to the insertion of section 1303 in the revenue act of 1918 is not out of place at this time. That act was for nearly 10 months before the committees of the two branches and the bodies themselves. During that period the committees, as well as the conference committees, were continually in receipt of advice from the expert who had for several years been in Washington under the auspices of Columbia University. The assistance, not volunteered but sought by the committee members individually and as a group, was of the utmost value, not alone in improving the phraseology of the bill but in preventing serious discrepancies from appearing in the text.

Not only during the Sixty-fifth Congress, but, I am reliably informed, for some years previously, this same expert advice had been available. Always rendered in an unostentatious way, it was without the offer of suggestions, but entirely in an advisory capacity when asked for. The Committee on Ways and Means felt that Congress should not be a mendicant on Columbia University nor receive favors at its hand, however gladly offered.

Realizing the value of the assistance rendered by this representative of the university, the committee unanimously inserted the item which the present bill is endeavoring to repeal. The experience of this committee was identical with that of which I had intimate personal knowledge over a period of several years in the Massachusetts House and Senate. The corrections of phraseology made by an expert there, employed at a liberal salary, was a great factor in having uniformity in the statutes of the State and the avoidance of errors under which the constitutionality of many bills might have been questioned.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of cutting every possible expenditure, and expect to vote throughout the session for all economies that may be proposed which are of such a character as to actually benefit the conditions of the Treasury. The fact that the amount involved in this item is a comparatively small one makes not the slightest difference to me. I should favor the committee attitude rather than the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] if I were not certain in my own mind that this is both a wise expenditure and one that in the end is a saving rather than an expense to the Public Treasury.

Railroad Control.

SPEECH

OF

HON. WILLIAM F. KIRBY,

OF ARKANSAS,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Friday, December 19, 1919.

The Senate had under consideration the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I regard the railroad problem as the most important one before the country for solution; and, finding it necessary to vote against the bill as proposed by the committee, I shall shortly explain my reasons for so doing.

The Government took over the railroads because it was necessary to do so, or thought to be necessary, to carry on the war successfully. As to the wisdom or unwisdom of that action, there is no need for any discussion now. The Government has operated the railroads. It took them over on the basis that the owners must be paid a reasonable rental for their use during the period of Government operation.

The railroads of Great Britain, I understand, were guaranteed about 7½ per cent income during their operation by the Government or during the war; and in this country we guaranteed the railroads the amount of their average return during the three years before we went into the war. It amounted to 10, 12, 15, 20, and 22 per cent and more upon the capital which the owners of the property had put into the roads in their construction and creation.

I want to read here just one extract from the speech made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who had given much thought to this matter, upon the bill providing compensation for the roads:

I turn now to other railroads in the table, to which I shall often refer. The Illinois Central Railroad will be guaranteed a net income of 11.33 per cent upon its capital stock, the Louisville & Nashville an income of 16.75 per cent, the Norfolk & Western an income of 12.51 per cent, the Atlantic Coast Line 10.80 per cent. I shall only mention a few of the principal companies in order that the full significance of what we are doing can be understood.

I turn to the western district and find that our guaranty, together with other income which the company possesses, will furnish to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe a return of 9.70 per cent upon its capital stock. The Chicago & North Western will be guaranteed an income of 10.18 per cent; the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, 22.05 per cent; the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie, 12.09 per cent. So I might proceed, naming all these railroads which compose the 140,000 miles which my amendment will affect. It is sufficient to say that the average guaranteed income upon capital stock in the eastern district is 11.48 per cent, the average in the southern district is 12.37 per cent, and the average in the western district is 9.96 per cent. Of course, these averages are applied only to the roads which have in the last three years earned a net income of more than 5 per cent upon the capital stock.

Mr. President, I have presented the effect of this bill with a great deal of earnestness and at very great length. The subject, I think, interests the people of this country more than any other matter. It is obvious that when these incomes are guaranteed; when wages are increased, as they will be; when the cost of operation increases, as it must, the rates which are to be paid by the people of the country for the transportation of their commerce will also be increased.

Mr. President, the Government has taken over and operated the railroads and guaranteed their owners a certain per cent income return, and now the time has come when the people are insisting that there shall be a final disposition made of the problem; that the roads shall either be released to private ownership or that Government control shall be continued, if that can be done and would best promote the public interest. I am only going to discuss the matter very briefly upon the proposition of the present guaranteed rate.

It has been a losing proposition for some time, as we know. Improvements have been made, as has been pointed out by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]; changes have been made in operation that have resulted to the benefit of the public. We have lost in the operation of the railroads, as I understand, the first eight months of this year, $275,000,000—more than a million dollars a day for the whole time. That appears from the report of the Director General. I now ask to have the Secretary read the report for the month of October, in which it appears we have made $2,600,000 on the operation of the roads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

OCTOBER PROFIT IN RAILS REPORTED AS $2,603,423.

The United States Railroad Administration made public yesterday financial results of operating the class 1 railroads during October, showing a net profit for the month of $2,603,423.

Operating revenues for the mileage reported, representing 97 per cent of the roads Federally operated, amounted to $503,488,334, while the operating expenses were $399,400,554, leaving a net operating revenue of $104,087,780. Deducting taxes, rents, etc., amounting to $27,128,003, the net operating revenue was $76,956,777.

One-twelfth of the annual rental due the companies covered by the report amounts to $74,356,354, so the net profit shown for the properties was $2,603,423.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, the owners of railroads have been guaranteed a rental for the property operated by the Government, this class of roads, as I understand it, of $892,376,248 a year. That much the Government is bound to collect or pay over in any event to these railroad owners. That much it has agreed to do.

I opposed, at the time we took over the railroads, paying such high rates of compensation as were finally agreed to be paid. It was thought then by many of us that fully $175,000,000 more than fair compensation, more than ought to be paid was agreed to be paid, and many have insisted since that time that the Government is paying $200,000,000 more than ought to have been paid as a rental for the operation of these roads during the war, than would have been a fair return under the conditions existing upon the capital invested.

Now, we have reached the time when something has to be done about it, and I am only going to address myself to the public interest, the public service feature of the matter. I am not going to talk so much about the returns, the rentals, that must be paid to the railroad owners for their property. It is realized, of course, that their property can not be taken for public use without just compensation. We all know that. I am not going to speak about what shall be done for the laborers, the employees, who must operate these railroad systems for the public service that is to be rendered. I am not going to discuss the antistrike feature of this bill. I have my own settled views and convictions about such a provision; but since I intend to vote against the bill, I shall not discuss that feature at all. But what is best to be done with the railroads from the view of the public interest, or what the public is entitled to expect in service from these carriers?

What ought to be done with them?

It is claimed that the railroads that carry 30 per cent of the freight of this country can not live under reasonable rates, that they can not live under the rates required to be levied by the bill to provide a return of 5½ per cent to 6 and 7 per cent upon the total value of all the railroad property in any one group; that these weak roads can not live otherwise. In other words, the railroads that are strong are allowed to make more than would be a fair return on their property under the average rates required to be levied to enable the weaker roads to continue in operation and part of the money shall then be taken from them and turned over to the weak railroads that must be kept as a part of the service for the public. The remainder of the overplus to be put in a reserve fund charged with a public trust in accordance with section 6 of the bill. Thus it is proposed to allow all shippers to be required to pay a greater amount, higher rates for service than will provide a reasonable return upon all the value of the carriers' property, some of which is to be retained by the strong roads and the remainder of it placed in a reserve fund, where, of course, it never gets back to the shipper from whom it was unduly exacted.

That seems to be the procedure. The committee makes the further statement that it would not be difficult to have a unified system, where the public might be served with all the systems of railroad that have been built, its convenience could be subserved if the Government owned all of them. That is the statement made by the committee. They say, however, that that is not to be thought of, that it can not be done, and that therefore they have assumed to put into these groups for valuation, rate fixing, and operation 20 to 35 groups, all of the railroads of the United States.

The bill directs that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall proceed to fix rates that will make a return upon the operation of these groups of railroads of not less than 5½ per cent, and if it shall net above 6 or 7 per cent that the overplus shall be put into a fund and divided between the railroads and the public, that certain portions of this fund shall go to the Government, charged with a trust, and may be used in the designated ways.

When you get to that proposition, it seems to me that there is no more objection under the Constitution, and under its prohibitions, to saying that we will keep the railroads and operate them by the Government, and instead of paying 10, 12, 15, or 20 per cent, as we have done heretofore, that we will reduce the income and will pay only 6 or 7 per cent upon the value of the railroad property as will be guaranteed under the provisions of this bill. You say, that would be taking the property of the railroads without compensation, contrary to the provisions of the Constitution. We would be taking them for a public service, but not more so than you are taking some of the money they are allowed to make under this bill. You say we only guarantee them so much, but you provide if it shall go above 6 per cent, then the Government shall own part of the overplus, charged with a public trust that may be used for certain purposes but never paid back to the shippers.

Where would there be anything more nearly wrong or unconstitutional than that in providing that the Government shall continue the operation of these roads and pay 5 or 6 or 7 per cent, all that it ought to be worth to people who have invested their money in railroad stock and securities.

There is no difference in principle in the propositions. This money ought not to be exacted from the shippers and users of the road who are required to pay for this service unless it is necessary to provide reasonable compensation to the carrier for the service rendered. Under the law it is not contemplated that it can be done, and the only theory under which it can be held that this method proposed is constitutional is upon the basis that we have the right to fix just and reasonable rates, such rates that will provide a reasonable return upon the property investment, and when you get above the amount of 6 per cent income out of the rate, then you say that rate was unreasonable, or, rather, you say the rate was too high, that the owners only had a right to a reasonable compensation, and therefore we can reduce the rate of income by taking it off at the top or at the bottom. That is the idea, it seems to me, that this bill proceeds upon. They propose to take the individual's money allowed to be exacted from him by the railroads, and put it into a certain fund, charged with a public trust, and give neither him nor the railroad any benefit whatever for it.

If this same proposition was put in the other way, if we should reduce the amount to be paid the carriers under Government operation, that would go into the public fund, would go for the public benefit, and it would be no more illegal or unconstitutional than the proposal here made, in my opinion.

The country would have the benefit of unified control in that way. You would have no more expense in that way than you are going to have in this, and these railroads could be operated for the public convenience, for which they were allowed to be constructed in the first instance, and as they must always be maintained, for the public interest and to serve the public convenience.

There has been a raise of about 25 per cent in rates since Government operation began, and it is asserted that there will be another 25 per cent raise in rates required under the plan of operation proposed by this committee bill, which will cost the public about a billion dollars more annually. The chairman does not think that that statement is warranted. He does not believe there is any substantial ground for saying that there will be required an increase of 25 per cent in rates to make this proposed plan successful. The amount guaranteed to the roads must be realized, and if it can not be made under the rates that are already being maintained, then new rates must be allowed under this bill by the Interstate Commerce Commission that will produce the required amount of revenue.

If we have been paying too much rental on these railroads, as is undoubtedly the case—10, 15, and 20 per cent, more than 20 per cent in some instances, for we are providing in this bill that hereafter they shall not be allowed to receive more than 6 per cent or more than 7 per cent in any event, which shows we have been paying too much. That is unquestionably true. If we have been paying too much, that difference over what is a reasonable compensation more than they will be entitled to under this bill, why can not the guaranteed income be reduced under existing conditions and the Government continue their operation and be allowed to have the benefit of that reduction and the people be given the benefit of the unified system of operation? That is a matter that should be considered, it seems to me.

Let us look just a little bit further. The committee statement about the question of control and operation is that the roads shall "be returned to their owners for private operation under public control and regulation."

"Private operation under public control and regulation." That is the system that is proposed for giving them a reasonable return upon their investment. It is also proposed that the Government shall give them many other advantages. That the Government shall permit them to have 10 years to pay what is due the Government for improvements to their property during Government operation. They have had more advantages than and other set of people, owners of property, in the United States during the war. Their plants were taken over and they were guaranteed the highest rate of income or return that they had been making in years, 10, 15, and 20 per cent, and it was as certain to be paid as that the Government was solvent.

Why should their owners expect any special protection hereafter when the roads are released to private control? Then I say, if the railroads shall be released to private operation to-day, under the expensive and complex plan here proposed, let them go back to private ownership, and since the Government made $2,600,000 net in the month of October in their operation and paid $892,376,248, or at that rate of rental, why can not the carriers make their own income at the present rates without any guaranty and serve the public as they did before the war?

Where is there any benefit to the public from this new system over the old? Why not let them go back to private ownership as formerly, under the present rates? It should not be necessary, if they go back to private control, that rates be increased 25 per cent. Why should the rates be increased 25 per cent then when with the present rates under Government control there remained a surplus for the month of October of more than two and one-half millions of dollars after paying the agreed rental of from 10 to 25 per cent on the entire capital invested? Why should an increase in rates be necessary?

There would not be any necessity for its being done, and it seems to me that the roads ought to go back to private control, if they must be released by the Government, and let them be operated and managed and regulated as they were before the Government took them over. They are in better physical condition now than when taken over, have better equipment, and their income has been guaranteed throughout the war, and the money has been paid to their owners—10, 20, 30, and 40 per cent—in Government operation under war conditions. They have been favored. They have not lost money, and had no chance of doing so under the Government guarantee.

Why then should we disturb ourselves about this complicated system of railroad operation proposed? Let us take the other horn of the dilemma. The same law under which we took the railroads over provided that they should continue under Government control and operation for 21 months after the war is officially declared ended. The Government will operate the roads for that time unless they are sooner released by the President. If the railroads are released by the President, who is going to suffer? Certainly not the railroads. They have been guaranteed and have received the rentals that were agreed to be paid by the Government throughout all this time of stress and trouble. The rates have been increased 25 per cent, to where the Government in October made over two and a half million dollars after paying this high rental at the rate of $892,000,000 a year.

If they shall be released to private control, why can they not exist as they did heretofore, under the regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to rates, and under the regulation of the State commissions, as the case was heretofore?

Why should we adopt this proposed new system, that is so complex and difficult to understand and that has not been fully considered in the Senate? I would like to have had further time to consider this matter. It is the greatest question before the American people now, and there is no good reason, in my opinion, why it should be rushed through by to-morrow.

If the railroads shall be released to private ownership, their condition is better than it was before the war, when they were taken over, and they have had more money than they were earning in past years, paid to them regularly, under Government control.

If the railroads shall be retained by the Government for another 21 months, without new legislation, the condition would be as good for the railroads and the public as it is now, unless the Congress should say: "Here, we do not propose to guarantee these railroads hereafter, or during the last 21 months of this operation, as much as 10 to 20 and 30 and 40 per cent on the capital invested. We are going to say that you shall have a reasonable return on your money, and that it shall not be over 6 or 7 per cent, as provided in the bill."

It will then be claimed if you do that that you are taking the railroad's property without just compensation for the public service. What is the difference in result in reducing the income agreed to be paid in the present law and in allowing only such a reduced rate of income under this bill? There is no difference under the law. If the other money is charged with a public trust and kept under the claim and theory that it is part of the rate regulation, it could be done the same way now and with much more justice in this particular case, because the Government has had the risk and it has done the operating and it has paid the very high rentals all this time.

I think the public interest would be better served if the railroads were released to private ownership without any further law except under the operation of the Interstate Commerce Commission to guarantee the public reasonable rates, and we might impose another charge upon the Interstate Commerce Commission or a commission of like authority and power to assure that the operatives should have reasonable wages and be protected against unfair conditions. That could all be done by one law providing for it, and we would have a system of operation of railroads that the people would have the right to rely upon, that would serve their needs, that would not cost them any more than they have paid heretofore; that would cost them less, in fact, and that ought to cost them less.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the things I have said here are not only practical but that they are right. The public interest ought to be protected somewhere, and if by one bill you are going to reduce the income of the railroads to 5½ or 6 per cent, and it shall not go over 7 per cent in any event, then certainly the railroads could not complain if it were reduced in the other case.

I do not think that the committee or the Congress or the Nation should hesitate to tackle any sort of a proposition because it is difficult. This is a difficult problem, and this is a most difficult bill that has been gotten up by the committee. It appears to have been fairly well considered, and I have no doubt but that the committee took advantage of the best expert advice and opinion they could get about the best method for the final disposition of the railroads—for their operation under a new system; but it seems to me very complicated on the two features that I have mentioned. It federalizes the whole business; it destroys in effect the powers of the railroad commissions of the different States; it provides that you shall take the revenues after they have been raised for a particular purpose and paid by the shipper, after they have been taken away from him, more than enough to compensate the railroad for the service rendered, that the overplus shall be charged with a public trust and turned over and devoted to other uses.

I am not going to vote for the bill. I am not going to vote for it because I believe that in either event, if the railroads are retained by the Government with a proper reduction of guaranteed income or released to private ownership under the conditions I have mentioned, that the public convenience would be better served than it will be under the operation of the bill when it shall become a law.

The Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARK BURDICK.

OF RHODE ISLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, to-day we are to pass upon the railroad bill as it comes to this House from the committee of conference.

It is without doubt the one measure coming before this session of Congress that has attracted the most widespread interest and publicity, and it is the one measure that is of most vital consequence to the present and future welfare of our country.

The reason for the so great interest in this measure is not hard to find, for were it not for the attitude taken by labor upon the measure a large percentage of that interest would never have been aroused.

The railroads were taken under Government control in the early days of this country's entry into the great World War, and were so taken solely as a war measure. That this control has been extremely costly no one will dispute; that it was worth while no one can deny.

So costly has been this control that even the most ardent advocates of Government ownership can not defend the experiment except as a war measure, and yet Government-ownership advocates would seek to have it continued during a period of peace in the hope that the showing then made will justify said continuance.

I am, however, firmly convinced that this period of Government control, even with the unusual demands of war time, has fully demonstrated the futility of Government ownership of railroads in this republican country of ours, and I welcome that day so near at hand upon which the President has decreed that the roads shall return to the initiative and competition of private ownership.

And yet I should hesitate to vote for this bill were I persuaded that there is anything in it that would work an injustice to that large body of honest and patriotic Americans upon whom the success of the roads are dependent—that body of men included in the general term "labor."

I am convinced that every Member of this Congress who will cast his vote in favor of the conference report will do so with the honest conviction that he is doing what is best for the country as a whole and giving to labor all that it has a right to demand—a square deal.

The labor provisions of the bill furnish a speedy way to place all their grievances before a fair and impartial tribunal and call for a reasonably prompt and honest adjudication of all such disputes. Nowhere in the bill is there any compulsion upon labor and nowhere in the bill is any advantage given to the railroads in the settlement of labor disputes.

For once the interests of the public are deemed of sufficient importance to be given recognition, and I feel sure that every employee of the railroads will feel that when he submits his case to a tribunal made up of an equal representation of his fellow employees, his employer, and the public the decision of such a tribunal will be fair. Labor—true to all American traditions—demands no more than it is willing to give, and when a square deal is obtained, capital, labor, and the public are satisfied.

In his first message to Congress Abraham Lincoln said:

I am most happy to believe that the plain people understand and appreciate this—

The maintenance of the Union—

It is worthy of note that while in this, the Government's hour of trial, large numbers of those in the Army and Navy who have been favored with the offices have resigned and proved false to the hand which had pampered them, not one common soldier or common sailor is known to have deserted his flag.

And so, when the policy we are inaugurating to-day shall have become an accomplished fact, it will be found that the plain people understand and appreciate what we do to-day, and that no common American fighter in the battle for reconstruction will be known to have deserted his post of duty.

I consider that this bill is to labor a bill of rights, and I doubt not that when thoroughly understood it will be so acclaimed by labor itself.

On Conference Report on Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN B. MADDEN.

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, although the war still technically exists, the treaty of peace not having been ratified, and hence the proclamation of peace not having been issued by the President, it nevertheless becomes the duty of the Congress to forward the work of placing America in its domestic relations on a peace basis, and nothing which we can do will go further toward that than the legislation which is now pending before us for final enactment.

The United States is fortunate in having the greatest railroad system in the world. Two years ago when the Nation was at war the railroads of the country were turned over to the President as a war measure. Since that time they have been controlled and operated by the Government under the President's direction, and the time has now come when they must be returned to their owners and functioned through private management.

The railroads are the arteries through which the industrial lifeblood of the Nation flows. Without them prosperity would be impossible. They are interwoven into every activity of American industrial life, and upon their proper management and success depends the integrity and well-being of the Nation's business as a whole. To turn them back to private management under proper conditions is a paramount national duty. To turn them back to their owners without some assurance that they will be able to function would be a crime. Many men here believe that no legislation is necessary; others believe they should still continue to remain under Government control.

I am one of those who believe that legislation is vital to their future success and to the country's future prosperity, and I also believe that under no circumstances should they longer remain in control of the Government. The Railroad Administration admits that they have been operated at a loss of $636,000,000 since they came under Federal control, and some assert the price was cheap. Others assert that the loss has been as much as $1,500,000,000; some assert that it has been $2,500,000,000; and while I make no assertion that the amount expended by the Government over and above what the normal cost was before the war is a total loss, the fact is that the actual cost in excess of prewar cost amounts to $4,086,000,000, and is represented by the following figures: Freight and passenger rates have been increased to yield during the period of Government control $2,200,000,000; $1,250,000,000 has been appropriated out of the Treasury, and losses amounting to $636,000,000 have been sustained, making in all a stupendous sum, far in excess of what the total cost of Government was for every activity prior to the war, indicating an extravagance in the management of these properties which argues more forcibly against Government ownership than anything else could do.

The importance of the pending legislation will be more apparent to everyone when it is understood that the President has already issued an irrevocable proclamation under which the roads are to go back to their owners at midnight on March 1. Without the legislation, under that proclamation the roads will be turned back in a state of chaos, disorganized and financially bankrupt, carrying distress and failure into every line of industry throughout the country. With the legislation, provision is made to return the roads to private management under conditions which are not only just but equitable and makes reasonably certain the maintenance of the business equilibrium of the country and insures an opportunity for the exercise of initiative and systematic management calculated to stabilize conditions in every line of effort.

It becomes increasingly important as the days go by that in the transformation from war to peace no disturbance shall be created in the country's business fabric through any legislation enacted by the Congress or by failure to legislate on the great problems likely to affect the happiness and prosperity of our people.

The pending bill, of course, does not meet with universal approval. It would be strange if any legislation involving so many intricate problems should meet with universal approval. There are many things in the pending bill to which I do not subscribe, but, on the whole, I think it may well be said that after nine months of careful study and exhaustive research by the committees of the House and Senate, working diligently and patriotically, with no motive except the public good, that the best possible solution of the question has been reached, and the committees are to be congratulated on the success of their work, and they are certainly entitled to the thanks of the country for their devotion to the country's interests.

Some attempt to justify their opposition to the bill on account of the provisions in the labor section, but my study—and I have made a conscientious study of it—leads me to the unalterable conclusion that there is not a word in the labor section of the bill that any reasonable man can object to. The provision embrace neither coercion nor compulsion. Any action to be taken in connection with such labor problems as may arise from time to time is purely voluntary. No man is forced to submit his case for consideration to the boards created by the labor section of the bill, and neither is he bound by any decisions that may be rendered by such boards. Perhaps it may be asked, in view of this, why the labor boards are created. I have asked myself that question more than once, and, indeed, I have frequently answered my own questions in the negative. I have not thought the labor section in the law to be necessary. I would prefer to have seen the matter of adjusting grievances left to the employers and their employees, for I feel that, on the one hand, through the agencies of their committees the employees, with a full knowledge of all the elements entering into their grievances, and, on the other hand, the employers through the agency of their committees possessing similar knowledge, would be better qualified to adjust any differences than any board or boards created possibly could. But legislation of this magnitude, or any legislation, in fact, can never be enacted to meet the views of all. Its final enactment must be the result of compromise, and the best compromise is the one which more nearly meets the views of all without meeting the views of any and is the most likely to be equitable and just. Legislation that is strongly approved by one element and strongly opposed by another is never satisfactory and rarely ever enforceable; and so, on the whole, I feel that a conclusion in this phase of the legislation has been reached which in the long run will meet with little or no resistance. The labor section of this bill leaves every man free to act, free to work, or free to quit, either as an individual or in groups.

Many Members here are opposed to the bill because of what they call improper guaranties. Now, what is it that is guaranteed? Nothing, except that the roads shall be turned over to the owners with a certainty that they will be permitted to earn the amount paid them during the war under the standard return contract for a period of six months from the 1st of March, and this guaranty applies also to the wages of the men, which it is provided shall not be reduced by any action of the railroad owners during the six months' period ending September 1 next. Those who express their opposition to the bill on account of this guaranty are loudest in their demands for a continuation of Government control and the extravagant waste resulting from it. Those who oppose the continuance of the guaranty of the standard return for six months would continue to keep the roads under Government control without any limitation on the amount of the expenditures. The opponents of this guaranty are the men who would draw upon the Public Treasury without limit to meet unjustifiable expenditures and impose additional tax burdens on the people to meet the obligations thus created.

No man can afford to vote against this conference report unless he be saturated with the virus of Government ownership, or is willing to invite nation-wide disaster of the industries of the country by turning the roads back into private hands without an opportunity to function, for it must be realized that the railroads of the country can not be put into bankruptcy without bringing financial disaster to all other lines of industry. The business of the railroads and the business of labor, and manufacture, and agriculture, and banking, and merchandising are so closely interwoven that disaster can not befall one without embracing all.

The responsibility for the enactment of this legislation rests primarily with the Republicans in the Congress, but the Demócrats can not escape their share of the responsibility. Republicans and Democrats alike in the Congress are here to represent the American people and in this instance they should so represent them as to provide adequate transportation facilities for the Nation, without which it is unnecessary to say, no prosperity can exist in the land. There never has been a greater issue before the people than the one now pending in the House. Individual action among Members can have no place in the consideration of a great problem like this. The Republican majority must prove itself to be a great constructive force, courageous enough to meet the issue; wise enough to meet it properly and patriotic enough to relegate individual views to meet the country's pressing needs. The ability of the majority to function on what I believe to be the greatest problem that has been presented for our consideration is on trial. Failure on our part to meet the issue wisely and promptly will justify rebuke at the hands of the country.

Objections are made by many to what it known as section 6 of the bill, who profess to believe that a guaranty of a fixed dividend rate to the railroads is provided. Now, what does section 6 provide? It provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the right to divide the railroad systems of the United States into groups, and that the property of each group, not the stocks and bonds, shall be valued by the Interstate Commerce Commission, that upon the value fixed by the commission a rate shall be made which will yield for the coming two years not in excess of 5½ per cent; that if more than 6 per cent is earned under the rate fixed on all the value of the property of the railroads within the group, used for transportation purposes, that one-half of the amount earned over 6 per cent shall go into the treasury of the Interstate Commerce Commission and placed in a fund to be used from time to time for the purchase of equipment for the weak roads of the country and leased to such railroads at a rental charge that will yield the Government not less than 6 per cent on the amount so invested. This does not mean that the railroads are guaranteed the right to earn up to 5½ per cent; what it does mean is that they are restricted in their right to earn more without a division of the earnings with the Government. It does not mean that all the railroads in the group will earn 5½ per cent either. It is well understood that out of the 2,000 roads in the United States only about 300 are profitable. Some of these roads make large earnings on the same rates paid to the roads which make losses running within the same zone. The roads which make earnings are probably fortunately situated, in that they run through densely populated manufacturing sections of the country and rich agricultural territory. They are highly organized; their management is scientific; they have the brains, the genius, and the initiative that enables them to make profits where less ably managed roads running through less favorable territory make losses. These prosperous roads have always been permitted to retain all of their earnings. Henceforth they are to be restricted in their right to earn more than 6 per cent without a division with the Government. One-half of the excess earnings over the 6 per cent, as I have said, are to be turned into the fund for the upbuilding of the weak roads out of a system of loans by the Interstate Commerce Commission on proper security and under proper restrictions, thus affording to the communities through which these weak roads run an assurance of transportation facilities equal to those afforded to the people of every other section of the Nation.

Even the 5½ or 6 per cent of which I speak is not permitted to be paid to the road under this provision of the bill if the road does not make it. If the road makes but 1 per cent that is all it will get. If it makes 2 per cent it will get that, but the road that does not make has a certainty that out of the earnings of the prosperous roads which are taken by the Government it will have an opportunity to lease equipment furnished through the Interstate Commerce Commission and to make loans to enable it to build up its property, and thereby assist the community through which it runs in the movement of its commodities on equal terms with territory where more prosperous conditions obtain.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, under this bill, is given wide powers. It is authorized to prohibit the issuance of stocks and bonds by any road in the United States without first having all the facts presented upon which the proposed issue is to be based, so that henceforth, whatever may have been the practice in the past in that respect, this bill gives the assurance that no watered stocks on any railroad properties can be issued. More than that the Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized to prevent the construction of railroads through territory not approved by it. This will, in the future, prevent railroad officials from speculating on the construction of railroads in territory where railroads are not necessary, and in the future no railroad can be built except in territory approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The commission is also authorized to prevent the abandonment of any roads now in existence, except where it may be concluded the public interest will be served by the abandonment.

There are $500,000,000 appropriated in this bill, $200,000,000 of which are to be used for the first two weeks' pay rolls after the roads are turned over to private management, the Government to be recouped from the collection of funds now in the hands of conductors and agents. The pay rolls of the employees of the railroads amount to $375,000,000 a month, and it was thought wise in this provision of the bill to appropriate a sufficient amount to assure a margin of safety. Three hundred million dollars of the amount is intended to be used as a revolving fund placed at the disposal of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is given authority to make recommendations to the Secretary of the Treasury for loans to the railroads, thus preserving the financial integrity of the roads and preventing them from the necessity of going into the open market to borrow when conditions are such as to make it likely that such loans will disturb the conditions of the country. No loans can be made from this fund without complete security, without proof of ability to pay, without a definite determination by the Interstate Commerce Commission that the loan is needed, without knowledge of the purpose for which the money is to be used, nor without the approval of the commission, and upon all such loans 6 per cent interest is to be paid, which goes into the Treasury of the Commission and continues to be used as a revolving fund for the purpose indicated.

On the whole I think the bill will meet the approval of the people of the country. It is a simple measure of justice to the owners. It is an attempt to stabilize the affairs of the Nation, to bring back the business of the Nation under individual direction, to encourage initiative, to prevent waste, to lighten the burden of taxation, to relieve distress, to create confidence, to abrogate war powers formerly delegated to the President; in short to bring back America's ancient glory in times of peace and to place upon the individual responsibility for his own success rather than to continue the Government guardianship over all the activities of the people.

The hour has struck; the time has come when war powers to Government officials must be set aside and the people of the Nation permitted to go their way as law-abiding citizens, working out as best they can their own destiny. The enactment of this law brings us into full view of the dawn of a new day, with the sun of peace shining over the Nation's hills and valleys and crops and people, bringing the warmth of its rays into the heart of the Nation and bidding them pass on under the song of peace and the hum of industry to a new and enduring peace and a continued prosperity and happiness.

Railroads.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. BAER,
OF NORTH DAKOTA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following article by Director General Walker D. Hines, of the United States Railroad Administration:

THE HISTORY OF FEDERAL CONTROL AND OPERATION OF THE RAILROADS.
(By Director General Walker D. Hines, of the United States Railroad Administration.)

The railroad problem is so complex and so important that it deserves honest-minded analysis; and this not because the plan of any one group of advocates should be supported, but because the best solution, upon whatever principle it proceeds, will be promoted by clearness of understanding of the facts. I therefore bespeak your careful consideration of the following effort to analyze the principal features of Federal control, which are now so much under discussion:

1. The alleged excessive costs of railroad operation by the railroad administration: The confused notion finds support that while the increased operating cost in private enterprises is due to war conditions, a corresponding increase in railroad operating cost is due to mistakes of the railroad administration. Such an argument assumes that the railroads should have been, and in the future can be made to be, independent of economic conditions which have affected and will affect every other industrial enterprise. The public will deceive itself to its own injury if it is led to rely upon this fallacy.

Simply as an illustration reference will be made to the largest private enterprise in the country. Moody's Manual for 1919 shows that the operating costs of the United States Steel Corporation increased from $494,800,000 in 1914 to $1,240,800,000 (in showing this figure for operating costs for 1918 there has been excluded the amount of Federal income, war profits, and excess-profits taxes shown by the Steel Corporation's annual report to its stockholders) in 1918 (the figures for 1919 not yet being available), this being an increase of $746,000,000. That is, the expenses of the Steel Corporation in 1918 were 151 per cent more than its expenses in 1914. The public naturally assumes until the contrary is shown that this increase was the normal result of enlarged production and necessary increases in prices and wages due to war conditions.

The operating costs of the railroads for 1919 can now be closely approximated, and therefore will be used for comparison, because they are larger than for 1918. The operating costs for the Class I railroads were $2,140,000,000 for 1914 and were approximately $4,324,000,000 for 1919, being an increase of $2,184,000,000. In other words, the operating costs in 1919 were 102 per cent more than the operating costs in 1914. But many people are disposed to assume until the contrary is proved that this increase in railroad-operating costs is due to mistakes of the Railroad Administration and not to enlarged production of transportation or to necessary increases in prices and wages.

PUBLIC WILL NOT FOOL ITSELF.

We find that the Steel Corporation's tonnage of finished products increased about 55 per cent in 1918 over 1914, with the result that its increase in its cost per ton of finished product in 1918 was 61 per cent as compared with 1914. The increased service of the railroads in 1919 will be not less than 26 per cent in excess of the service in 1914, so that this would indicate an increased cost per unit of service on the railroads of not more than 60 per cent in 1919 as compared with 1914.

In thus endeavoring to illustrate the all-pervasive increase in costs by this comparison between the principal steel enterprise and the railroad enterprise, the selection of the steel operations in 1918 for comparison with the railroad operations in 1919 is believed to be clearly less favorable to the Railroad Administration than the comparison would be if the 1919 figures of steel operation were now available. This is true because private industry, as well as the railroad industry, was subjected in 1919 to unfavorable conditions not prevailing in 1918, such as a slump in business in the first half of the year, interferences with the volume of business later in the year on account of strikes, the more complete effect of increased prices and wages, and the general relaxation in effort, which in 1919 has characterized all industry as compared with 1918. These additional difficulties are all reflected in the railroad operations for 1919.

Of course, no exact parallel can be claimed between any two radically different enterprises, and yet every fair-minded person must appreciate that until the contrary is shown the same presumptions of necessity for increased cost should obtain in considering railroad-operating costs as in considering the operating costs of great private enterprises. Certainly the public can not afford to fool itself by thinking that the railroads can be operated in a state of isolation from all those influences which have affected every other line of human activity, public and private, in this country and in other parts of the world as the result of the greatest economic and social upheaval that the world has ever known.

SAVING BY UNIFIED OPERATION.

It would be surprising if complete analysis did not indicate a more successful adjustment to the new conditions arising out of the war by the Steel Corporation with its unbroken continuity of management and policy extending over a period of nearly 20 years, and its ability to plan with confidence for the future, than by the United States Railroad Administration. It must be remembered that the Railroad Administration was created almost over night as a war emergency and avowedly as a purely temporary expedient; that it was consequently unable to create a really permanent organization or to hold throughout even its temporary life some of its most experienced members, and was without opportunity to carry out comprehensive policies of a reasonably permanent character either as to capital expenditures for new equipment and improvements or as to operation in respect of establishing permanent and more effective relationship between the management and the employees, and in other respects.

Considering the exceptional difficulties thus confronting the Railroad Administration, it is noteworthy that despite the all-pervasive influences of war conditions the increase in operating costs has been kept as low as it has been. It should also be appreciated that to an important extent the showing is relatively so favorable because of the very substantial savings which have been practical under unified operation notwithstanding its being hampered so seriously by the shortness and uncertainty of its duration.

Public discussion always assumes except when railroad operation is under consideration, that on account of the conditions growing out of the war the purchasing power of money is greatly decreased, so that it requires perhaps from $1.80 to $2 to buy as much materials and labor as $1 would have bought in 1914. Thought on this point should be clarified so that it will be generally appreciated that the dollar to be expended by the railroads for their operating costs can not be expected to go any further on the average than the dollar expended by anybody else.

"EXTRAVAGANT" WAGES PAID TO LABOR.

While so frequently ignored in discussion. yet there can not be serious denial that in the purchase of materials and supplies such as steel and iron, lumber, crossties, coal, and so forth, the railroads must pay the very heavy increase in prices which are paid by others similarly situated. These increases of themselves account for much of the increased expenses, although, of course, as in other industrial enterprises, the cost of labor is the largest element, and this will be separately referred to.

2. The alleged extravagance increases in wages of labor: Employees who work for the railroads are confronted with the increased cost of living just like other people, and increased wages for railroad employees have been not only necessary but just. Contrary to the popular impression, the increases to railroad labor have not been out of line with increases to labor generally. Referring again, purely for the purpose of suggestive illustration, to the United States Steel Corporation, the head of that corporation stated last spring as to the average of all its steel products that the direct labor cost per ton in March, 1919, was $34.61, as compared with $15.13 in 1913, an increase of 119 per cent. The Department of Labor in its monthly labor review for November, 1919, shows that the pay per hour to labor in the iron and steel industry increased on the average 121 per cent in 1919, as compared with 1913. The average increase in the rate per hour for all railroad employees for the year 1919, as compared with the year 1913, will not exceed 100 per cent, and such average increase at the end of 1919, with all readjustments then in effect, will not exceed 106 per cent.

When the Wage Commission, of which Hon. Franklin K. Lane was chairman, reported in the spring of 1916 on the wages of railroad employees it pointed out that, contrary to common conception, railroad employees were not highly paid, that 51 per cent received during 1917 $75 per month or less, and 80 per cent received $100 per month or less. The leading executives of the eastern railroads, when they appeared before the Interstate Commerce Commission in the fall of 1917, laid stress upon the fact that their earnings were not sufficient to enable them to pay adequate wages in competition with other industries.

INCREASES WERE LONG OVERDUE.

In making the important increases, which were as indispensable for the railroads as in other enterprises, and which were long overdue in the case of the railroads, the Government could not escape the policy of reasonably uniform treatment, and the result of this policy operated to produce numerous individual cases of abnormally large wage increases, but the matter, from the standpoint of its total cost to the railroads and the public, must be considered as a whole, and the average increase per hour to railroad employees as a whole has been no more than was responsive to the conditions which have forced heavy increases upon all industrial enterprises and has not been out of line with what other enterprises have done.

If this subject is viewed in the light of the facts, the conclusion can only be the pay per hour to railroad employees on the average makes a reasonable comparison with what has been done in private enterprises.

3. The alleged excessive increase in the number of railroad employees under Federal control: The increase in the number of employees has been due principally to the adoption of the eight-hour day. Prior to Federal control many classes of employees worked 10 hours per day, and in some instance even longer, although the adoption of the eight-hour day had already made substantial progress on the railroads.

There have been many comments on the fact that in July, 1919, there was an increase of 11.2 per cent in the number of employees over the month of December, 1917. Since July, 1919, was a month favorable to much outside work calling for additional employees, and December, 1917, on account of the severe weather, was a month unfavorable to outside work, and besides there was at that time an admitted scarcity of railroad employees on account of competition of munitions plants, etc., and the other war demands, a more reliable comparison of the difference between the number of employees under private control and under Federal control is the comparison of the entire year 1917 with the entire year 1919. On the latter basis there was an increase of 9.7 per cent in the number of employees for the year 1919 and yet the actual number of hours of work paid for was 5.9 per cent less in 1919 than in 1917. This is explained by the fact that during the year 1917 the employees worked on an average 261.4 hours per month, while during the year 1919 the employees worked on an average 218.5 hours per month; but it must be remembered that they were paid only for the hours worked, although, of course, at an increased rate per hour.

ADDITION OF EMPLOYEES NECESSARY.

People who believe it is good public policy to require employees in the railroad industry to work on an average throughout the year 261.4 hours per month can, of course, make an issue with the Railroad Administration as to the propriety of the policy of the eight-hour day which has resulted during the year 1919 in reducing the average number of hours worked per month to 218.5, but in the interest of an intelligent understanding of the matter the issue ought to be clearly made upon this broad question of policy. The matter ought not to be confused by some vague assumption that this increase in the number of employees is due to some insidious influence of the Railroad Administration in the interest of inefficiency.

It is also highly important to make clear that this increase in the number of employees on account of the eight-hour day does not involve in general an increase in the pay roll, because generally the pay is based not upon the number of employees but upon the number of hours worked. The rate of increase in pay per hour above referred to completely reflects the increased wage, yet the tendency to confusion on these matters is so marked that frequently the total increase in wages is referred to and, in addition, the increase in the number of employees is mentioned, on the erroneous assumption that that constitutes a corresponding further increase in operating cost.

Surely the public is entitled to be set right upon this proposition. It should not be led to think that the mere substitution of private control for the temporary Federal control will bring about the decrease in the number of employees to the prewar basis. Such a decrease will not come in any general sense except through a return to the longer working day which obtained in 1917. Prior to Federal control the train and engine men had the basic eight-hour day by virtue of the Adamson Act, but on the average all other classes of railroad employees had a working day substantially in excess of eight hours, though the eight-hour day had been adopted on some railroads as to some classes of employees.

CHARGE OF POLITICS IS REFUTED.

A further but relatively minor element working in favor of an increase in the number of employees is one which has been experienced by the railroads in common with all other forms of industrial enterprise. This grew out of the loss of experienced employees, both during the war and since, the extraordinary movement of employees from one employer to another resulting in an exceptional labor turnover and a widespread psychological unrest which seems to characterize every class of our citizens and which results in many employees being less attentive to their work. Similar causes have manifested themselves in enterprises generally. Certainly those who think both fairly and clearly can not in the same breath excuse this condition as unavoidable in private enterprises and charge it to the weakness of Federal control in the case of the railroads.

There is a predisposition to assume that any governmental activity is actuated by a purpose to increase the number of employees and from this premise, which is entirely mistaken as to the Railroad Administration, many erroneously attribute the increase in the number of railroad employees to some political preference for a larger rather than a smaller number of employees. The Railroad Administration has never had any such purpose.

On the contrary, the local railroad officers are expected to control this matter to the fullest practicable extent, and the central administration is constantly investigating local conditions and using its authority as well as its influence to stimulate local managements to avoid all unnecessary employment. These local managements are the same skilled railroad officers who operated the railroads prior to Federal control, and who will still continue to operate them after Federal control is ended. There has not been at any time any element of politics in the selection of either officers or employees by the Railroad Administration either in the central or regional offices or on the various railroads.

APPARENT DEFICIT EXPLAINED.

4. The deficit from railroad operations: This to a greater extent than anything else calls for clear and honest analysis. A deficit is due either to costs being too high or to revenues being too low. Fair-minded investigation will show, as is above explained, that the increases in cost have been in line with the unavoidable conditions which have controlled railroads as well as private enterprise. Of course, no industry so extensive as the railroad industry could be free from numerous incidents admitting of criticism; but, broadly speaking, the increase in costs has been fairly related to the changed conditions growing out of the war. This being true, the real explanation of the deficit is that the rate increase of 1918 could not be made effective soon enough and that perhaps railroad rates were not increased quite enough to pay all of the necessary increases in cost during the period of the war and readjustment.

To begin with, it was not practicable for the Railroad Administration to initiate any general increase in rates and put it into effect until June 10, 1918, as to passenger rates, and until June 25, 1918, as to freight rates. Thus, nearly six months of heavily increased costs had passed before these increased rates could be made effective. If these increases could have been made effective at the very beginning of Federal control, there would have been no deficit whatever from railroad operations up to and including the end of October, 1919. The entire deficit on the Class I railroads for that period of 22 months of Federal control of $480,200,000 would have been more than wiped out if the rate increases had been effective January 1, 1918.

The results for November and December, 1919, will be useless for the purpose of estimating normal earning capacity, because of the extraordinary interference with business and increase of operating burdens growing out of the unprecedented coal strike, which so seriously interrupted and dislocated railroad traffic throughout the country. Large deficits for these two months prove nothing except the destructiveness of the coal strike.

TRAFFIC COMMITTEES AND RATES.

The normal expenses of operations have been higher in 1919 than in 1918 because of still greater costs of materials and supplies and because of various readjustments in wages which were not completed in 1918. It may be that on these accounts, even under Federal control, a small additional increase in rates would be necessary to make the railroads self-sustaining, but the Railroad Administration has felt that conditions were too abnormal and were changing too rapidly to make a satisfactory basis for the determination of what this additional increase ought to be. This abnormal character was due largely to the remarkable slump in freight business following the armistice and lasting throughout the first six months of the year, and has been further accentuated by the unprecedented conditions of the coal strike in November and December.

The rate structures of the country are so complex that unnecessarily frequent changes therein are exceedingly disturbing to business interests. The general increase made in 1918 was carefully planned to avoid such difficulties as far as possible, and it is believed it involved less difficulties than any other plan which could have been then devised, but nevertheless, the readjustments which were called for by business interests, so as to avoid interference with established relationships, have for nearly a year and a half occupied most of the time of 33 freight-traffic committees located throughout the country and made up of representatives of the shippers and the carriers and have called for over 20,000 changes in the rates put into effect by the general rate increase.

It has been the judgment of the Railroad Administration that for the sole purpose of providing revenues for the Government during Federal control, the making of a further general modification of such complicated and delicately interrelated rate structures should not be entered upon without an adequate understanding as to the amount of revenue which it would be necessary to raise and that the conditions during 1919 have been too abnormal to admit of drawing a correct conclusion, although the strong indications are that under a continuance of unified control a large general increase could probably be avoided altogether. Of course, with a return to private control consideration immediately thereafter of rates to sustain the credit of the railroad companies is inevitable.

PUBLIC PAYS THE BILL EITHER WAY.

The deficit, therefore, is really due to this conservatism of the administration in deferring a rate increase until it could be reasonably sure as to the basis upon which it ought to be computed. The result has been simply that for the time being the deficit in railroad operations has been made good through general taxation of the public instead of through the special taxation arising from an increase in rates.

There is a popular catch-phrase argument to the effect that two years of Government control of the railroads have cost the country several hundred million dollars. The fact is that Government control has cost the amount of operating expenses during Federal control plus the rental, and, as above shown, these operating expenses do not in the aggregate reflect more than perfectly normal influence of the extraordinary conditions which have told on railroad operation as well as on other enterprises. By reason of the impossibility of anticipating with precision the amount of the increased operating cost, and by reason of the earnest desire to avoid unnecessary disturbances of the complicated rate structure, a part of the added cost has not been made good by rate increases, and therefore has had to be made good by general taxation. But the cost is the same in either event, is paid by the public in either event, and is due to war conditions. The cost which has been placed upon the public by private enterprises, which have increased their prices enough not only to anticipate and cover their war-operating costs but also to produce unprecedented profits, has been immensely greater than any cost placed upon the public by the Federal control of the railroads. The entire average increase in freight and passenger rates from 1914 to 1919, taking the country as a whole, has not exceeded 33 per cent, while the increase in the prices which the public has paid for the products of private enterprise in that time has been from 60 to 150 per cent and higher.

Those who think there should have been under Federal control general increases in rates as often as necessary to take care immediately of the entire expense of railroad operation, so that no part of it would be taken care of even temporarily through general taxation, are, of course, entitled to criticize the policy of the Railroad Administration, but here again the issue should be clear cut and should not be confused.

PRIVATE CONTROL WILL NOT CURE DEFICIT.

It would be most unfortunate if the public is misled into believing that the deficit is due to Federal control and is to be cured by the termination of Federal control, only to find that what will really cure the deficit will be an important increase in rates. Such an increase would equally cure the deficit under Federal control, and, in fact, it is likely that a substantially less increase would be necessary, because the full saving from unification could be preserved under Federal control, and further because under private control a wider margin of earnings will presumably be necessary to support the separate credit of the respective individual companies operating independently.

5. The railroad service: Clear thinking requires consideration of the plant with which the Government has had to perform the service. At the beginning of Federal control it was conceded that for several years, on account of high prices, difficulties as to railroad credit, and general uncertainty as to the future, insufficient new equipment had been obtained. During the first year of Federal control the amount of new equipment obtainable was limited absolutely by the amount of material which could be taken from other war purposes and devoted to the construction of railroad equipment. It was therefore impossible to construct any passenger, mail, or express cars, or any refrigerator cars, stock cars, or flat cars, but the Railroad Administration was able to obtain the material necessary to construct 100,000 freight cars of other types. During the second year of Federal control, although more material was available, it was not practicable to construct additional equipment because of the near approach of the termination of Federal control and the clearly expressed opposition of Congress to the idea of a further development of railroad facilities through the use of Government funds by the Railroad Administration. In January and February, 1919, the Railroad Administration advised a definite extension of Federal control, urging that in that way comprehensive plans could be put into effect for increasing railroad equipment and facilities to the extent called for by the prospective business of the country. This view was not acceptable to Congress, and there has been no basis for providing additional equipment. Accordingly the Railroad Administration has had to operate with an amount of equipment that was insufficient.

GREAT VOLUME OF FREIGHT AND PASSENGER TRAFFIC.

At the same time there has been an extraordinary volume of business. From January 1, 1918, to November 1, 1919, there were over 13,000,000 soldiers, sailors, and marines moved on the railroads, this being the equivalent of nearly 6,000,000,000 passenger miles, necessitating the use of 215,000 railroad coaches and Pullman cars and the movement of over 18,000 special trains. At the same time the movement of the civilian population reached proportions in excess of anything ever before experienced. The result was that the volume of passenger travel in the year 1918 was 8.1 per cent more than 1917, and the volume of passenger travel in 1919, up to October 31, was about 20 per cent more than in the corresponding period of 1917. Civilian inconveniences incident to this extraordinary passenger travel, which had to be handled without increase in passenger equipment, were inevitable.

The freight traffic for 1918 was in excess of that for 1917, which up to that time had been the heaviest year. During the first eight months of 1919 the freight traffic was considerably less than in either 1918 or 1917, on account of the great slump in business. But in the months of September and October, 1919, the traffic was greatly in excess of 1917, and for a part of the time in excess of that in 1918, notwithstanding the fact that the Railroad Administration was unable in 1919 to secure the heavy car loading which as a measure of patriotism had been obtainable in 1918.

Therefore, despite all criticism of the service, the Railroad Administration, with an inadequate plant, has actually performed an exceptional volume of service, and it has done this with less congestion than was ever known in previous periods of heavy business in recent years. Even at present, in the face of extremely difficult weather and the adverse effect of the influenza or railroad labor, a heavy volume of traffic is being moved. Of course, it can not possibly satisfy the demand, because of the insufficiency of the equipment and because the demand itself is most abnormal, due to the voluntary postponement of business last spring and its enforced postponement in the fall on account of the steel and coal strike.

COAL STRIKE DISLOCATED EQUIPMENT.

Throughout Federal control the service has been performed under the direction of the same railroad officers who were in charge during private control and they have had the benefit of a unified use of locomotives, cars, shops, and other facilities, which has added to the practicability of performing such a heavy service with such insufficiency of equipment. In passing, it is not out of place to mention the peculiar service rendered the public in anticipation of, during, and after the coal strike. Prior to the strike coal transportation was increased up to 13,200,000 tons per week (even more than the war record). During the strike eastern coal was supplied to the West (where, generally, no coal was being produced) over routes never normally contemplated. During the strike the distribution of all coal was handled by the Railroad Administration. After the strike the equipment, badly dislocated on account of the abnomal long hauls to the West, was readjusted so that in two weeks production was back to the normal winter basis.

6. The condition of the property: A great confusion is frequently apparent about the condition of railroad property, it being assumed that the property is dilapidated and will be turned back to the private owners in a condition hardly susceptible of operation. This is utterly untrue. The railroads are functioning effectively, are carrying an extraordinary traffic, and are in condition to carry it. With respect to equipment, locomotives will be in relatively good condition considering that they will just have gone through from three to four months of winter weather, much of it severe. Passenger cars will be in good and safe condition, although the inability to obtain new equipment for the reasons above explained results in the equipment being on an average practically two years older than at the beginning of Federal control, and there has perhaps been some loss in appearance. Despite claims to the contrary, freight equipment will compare favorably with the condition at the beginning of Federal control considering that its two years' additional age has not been offset by the purchase of as much new equipment as would have been purchased but for the obstacles above explained.

INVESTORS WERE FULLY PROTECTED.

During last summer the percentage of bad-order cars attained, and on account of the shop strikes remained at, a high figure, but for several weeks has been down to a normal basis. As to roadway and structures, the Government will likewise be able to show that on the average it has closely met its obligation to return the property in as good condition as when received. Undoubtedly difficulties as to obtaining ties, rails, and ballast and shortage of labor in putting them in have resulted in shortage in these respects on various railroads, but not so as to interfere with the adequate performance of the public service, and to an important extent, on the average, any shortages in these respects promise to be offset by overmaintenance in other respects.

7. The effect upon investors resulting from Federal control and its policy toward rate increases: A disposition has been developed in many quarters to think that in some way Federal control has been injurious to investors in railroad securities. The fact is that such investors have been far better protected than they would have been without Federal control. With all the existing uncertainties the prices of railroad stocks in general compare favorably with their prices in the month or two prior to the time Federal control was decided upon, although some of the stocks are much lower. But many investors seem to think that the Railroad Administration owed them a duty to increase rates so that at the end of Federal control the railroads would be generally self-supporting without any reference to the permanently established rate-making authorities.

This entirely misconceives the function of the Railroad Administration. That function was to initiate rates so far as might be deemed expedient in order to sustain the cost of operating the railroads as a unit during Federal control, and the important practical objections to premature or unnecessarily frequent increases in rates during Federal control have been stated above.

Congress did not contemplate that the director general would undertake to decide upon the rate structure necessary to enable all the various railroad companies to operate their properties separately and in competition and sustain their credit while doing so. The latter function is one which has never been taken away from the Interstate Commerce Commission and other permanent rate-making authorities and ought to be handled by them. If investors, dissatisfied with the status of their railroad securities, will compare the prices of the securities of railroad companies under Federal control with the prices of securities of public-utility companies not under Federal control, the protection which has been accorded by the Government, during Federal control, to the railroad investors will be very apparent.

HOPES FOR CLEARNESS OF UNDERSTANDING.

I have attempted this analysis with the earnest desire of clarifying the general understanding of the subjects discussed, believing that such clearness of understanding will be distinctly helpful in reaching correct conclusions upon the general railroad problem, and I submit my statements in the confident belief that they will be considered on their merits by a very great majority of the editors throughout the country.

WALKER D. HINES,
Director General of Railroads.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD F. McKINIRY,
OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920,

On the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. McKINIRY. Mr. Speaker, this pending railroad bill does not answer the question, "Shall we return the railroads to their owners?" It has been contended that Congress should pass this bill because it means the return of the railroads to their owners; but, as a matter of fact, the popular demand for the return of the railroads has been skilfully used by the Republican Party now in power in Congress as a cloak to foist upon this country a scheme to finance the securities of looted railroads and to add to their stock an enormous increase in value for the benefit of their owners. The Republican Party now in power in both House and Senate promised at the last congressional election that they would do everything possible to reduce the high cost of living. Not only have they failed to even try to bring about such a result but this one great act—probably the most important piece of legislation passed by the present Congress—will add to the expenses of the general public in this country at least $200,000,000 a year increase in transportation cost and thereby directly increase the high cost of living by that amount annually. I, personally, am in favor of the return of the railroads to their owners at the present time. There is no question involved in the vote on this present bill as to Government ownership. The plain public sentiment demands the return of the railroads, and I would gladly vote for a proper bill to bring about such a result, but I can not vote for this bill for various important reasons, and it is only necessary to state one reason which overshadows all the others, and that is the provision providing for an increase of freight and passenger rates, which will assure to the railroads at least 5½ to 6 per cent on their value for the next two years. What value such 5½ or 6 per cent rate is to be based on is left entirely in doubt. No physical valuation of the railroads which can be relied upon has yet been made. The Interstate Commerce Commission has been laboring on that very question for several years, and at least two years more will be required to finish its work.

Unquestionably, then, in the absence of an official and reliable valuation the Interstate Commerce Commission must accept as the value of the railroads their book value, which to-day is approximately $19,000,000,000. Six per cent on that amount would be over $1,200,000,000 per year, and as the standard return paid by the Government at the present time for the railroads during Government control, and which is based on their average earnings for the three years prior to the war, is $936,000,000 it is very evident that this bill provides for an increase of freight and passenger rates of over $200,000,000 a year. This bill provides not only for such increase in railroad rates, but also provides that one-half of the excess over 6 per cent shall be placed in a reserve fund under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to be loaned by the commission to other railroads or otherwise devoted to the needs of other roads. This provision has been declared unconstitutional by many eminent authorities, among them the Hon. Charles E. Hughes. A summary of his opinion shows clearly that this provision is either unconstitutional or else it provides for what is practically legalized robbery. These increased freight rates, according to Mr. Hughes, are either reasonable or unreasonable. If reasonable, then the taking of one-half of the excess of the just earnings of any railroad over 6 per cent is the taking of property without due process of law. If these increased freight rates are unreasonable, then the public has been charged an unreasonable rate, and is therefore being robbed in order to provide a large income for the railroads. In either event the second-class railroads, which have been looted by speculation and by the almost criminal acts of their owners, will be refinanced and rehabilitated by taking part of the earnings of those great trunk lines which have been properly financed and properly managed. For this reason alone I consider this bill a vicious and unwholesome piece of legislation. I believe that when the public knows the tremendous subsidy to be paid by the public guaranteed under this bill to the bankrupt railroads of this country, and when the public understands that the people must pay the staggering price called for under this bill, that the action of this Republican Congress will be condemned by the entire country.

The Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PATRICK McLANE,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to discuss the many complex phases of this railroad problem. Many of them are legal and technical and seem to puzzle the mind of the lawyer and technician. I have given this railroad problem some thought and from what I have learned from diligent study and investigation I have decided to vote against any bill that does not offer a better solution of this problem than we have had prior to the war, and from what I learn of the pending conference report it is not going to be an improvement on past railroad legislation.

Attempts have been made to class railroad operation with private business. The passage of the conference report, with its special and favored legislative provisions, has for all time put the railroads where they rightfully belong, in the noncompetitive class of industries.

I do not subscribe to the press propaganda that Government operation failed, nor do I approve of the Government guaranteeing railroad investments. It is a dangerous precedent to establish. Nor do I see any real merit in any legislation that does not make it mandatory for reduction of the outstanding stocks and bonds.

What the people want is a real, permanent, and fair solution of the railroad problem, and this solution can not be brought about by favoring any one particular class, as this bill proposes to do. I realize that invested capital is entitled to a fair return, but this fair return should be on invested capital only, and should not include a return on fictitious values or watered stock. The solution of this important railroad problem should not be approached from any angle other than one of public service, and if we attempt to solve it in any other way we only cloud the real issue.

Under the provisions of this bill we have embarked on a partial Government ownership plan without any possibility of deriving any of the benefits of Government ownership. Under the provisions of this bill we are going to guarantee the roads $300,000,000 more than the guaranty they are now receiving under present Government operation.

The enactment of the pending bill, with its financial guaranty provisions and its Government-loaning provisions, is paternalistic, and it is not only unwise but unnecessary legislation. It bolsters up the weak and overcapitalized roads, while it leaves the heretofore strong, efficient, and well-managed roads without incentive to carry out any efficient program they may adopt in the future.

Have the railroads been a success as an American transportation institution under private control? If so, there is no evidence of it. We are all cognizant of the fact that the railroads failed to function during the early period of the war, and because of their inability to do so the Government was forced to take them over and operate them purely as a war measure, and this happened, notwithstanding the fact that these railroads under private control collected from the public in 28 years preceding the war some $14,000,000,000 in profits. During this same period they increased their capitalization per mile from $59,000 to $75,000. During that same period the railroads of the country increased their book cost account of road and equipment from $8,738,533,165 in 1891 to $17,525,576,908 in 1916, an increase of approximately $9,000,000,000, while the mileage during that period increased 95,000 miles. During this same period the operating income per mile increased from $2,106 to $4,247. We also find that from 1891 to 1906 the book cost and road equipment account increased $3,682,000,000, while the mileage during that period increased 61,000 miles. It will be noted during the period from 1906 to 1916 the book cost of road and equipment increased $5,105,000,000, while the mileage for that period increased 35,000 miles. In other words the book cost of roads and equipment from 1891 to 1906 remained at $60,000 per mile. For the 10-year period from 1906 to 1916 the cost per mile for railroad building increased to $145,000. All this occurred when railroad labor was paid a low or nominal wage. If we compute railroad mileage that we will be forced to build in the next 25 years on the basis of what it cost during the period from 1906 to 1916 and we build 100,000 miles of road during that time, we will add to the present estimated value of $20,000,000,000, $14,000,000,000 more, making a total investment of $34,000,000,000 on which the public, under the provisions of the Cummins bill, will be forced to pay a fixed charge of 5½ per cent, which will amount at the end of that period to $2,000,000,000 per annum, or in the next 25 years the private operator will get out of the public approximately $41,000,000,000.

Thus we find that in 54 years the people of the country will have paid to private operators of railroads the enormous tax of $57,000,000,000, and at the end of that period the same operators will retain control of property which will be valued at not less than $35,000,000,000. If we add $35,000,000,000 in property value, which the private operators will retain at the end of this period, to the $57,000,000,000 in profits which they have gotten out of the public, we will find that it will amount to $92,000,000,000. This estimated property value of $35,000,000,000, which is low, will carry with it a taxing power that the public must pay of $2,000,000,000 annually. So this being the case, any observing person can readily see that the amount involved is a sufficient argument why Government operation should be discredited.

The pending bill will be instrumental in contributing $55,000,000,000 to a small group of railroad owners in the course of 50 years, thus proving conclusively that we are living in the past, legislating for the present, and not taking into consideration the best interests of the future of the American people.

I have taken 20 representative roads operating in various sections of the country for the purpose of determining their financial status, and I find on investigation that some of these roads, because of honest and efficient management, have reduced their fixed charge per mile considerably during the 10-year period. However, I find the tendency of most roads has been to increase their capitalization per mile, thereby increasing fixed charges and necessitating a greater earning power per mile. The increased capitalization of these roads for 10 years has been $20,000 per mile, while the increase in fixed charges for the same roads has been $672 per mile. I am inserting some figures in the RECORD, an examination of which will show the financial conditions of these railroads from 1904 to 1913, and it can readily be seen that the deplorable financial conditions we hear so much of was brought about invariably by bad management and not because the railroads were starved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, as some of the propagandists would have the public believe.

As an example of this, note what happened to the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad. The capitalization of this road in 1904 was $79,102, and in 1913 the capitalization increased to $193,413, an increase of $114,311 per mile. On examination we find the fixed charge per mile increased from $2,092 in 1904 to $6,458 in 1913. All this happened at the time when wages were normal, therefore the increased cost of maintaining this road can not be charged to high wages or to Government operation, and yet the public must pay in the way of freight rates an interest charge on this increased capitalization a sum that amounts to $14,000,000 annually, and the pending bill validates the $240,000,000 increase in valueless stocks that was added to this property. What has happened to the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad has happened to many of the railroads throughout the country, only in a lesser degree. This method of managing railroads puts on the American people a burden they are unable to bear, and no doubt has its effect on the cost of living. Notwithstanding that this condition prevails, the Government, under the provisions of the pending bill, not only proposes to validate and put new life into this overcapitalization and watered stock mentioned, but it also proposes to guarantee 5½ per cent on said capitalization.

There has been considerable clamor about Government operation of railroads and propagandists who have been at work since the armistice was signed conveyed or attempted to convey to the public through the press that Government operation of railroads was not only a costly venture but a failure. When that statement is analyzed, it will be found that it does not contain much truth. It is a well-known fact that the roads were taken over because they failed to function during the early stages of the war, and under Government operation they not only functioned but were a big factor in the speedy termination of the war. The Government operated the roads successfully despite the fact that they had to do so under adverse business, labor, and climatic conditions. If we recall, during the winters of 1917 and 1918, when the roads were taken over by the Government the weather was the most severe experienced in this country in many years. Of course, this had the effect of increasing operating costs; add this to the fact that many of the skilled and experienced employees were taken from their work and inducted into the Army, only to be replaced by men who, before they had time to become efficient, were also inducted into the Army. This continued during the war period, and undoubtedly had a tendency to keep railroad employees disorganized and could only tend to inefficiency.

The deficit of $600,000,000 has been extensively advertised as a reason why Government operation of railroads is not as economical as private ownership. This deficit had been caused by the increase in wages granted to railway men and the increase in cost of material. The increase in freight rates not being proportionate to the increase in wages and material naturally left a deficit. This would have happened whether the railroads were under private or Government control. As to the charge that the Government can not operate the railroads as economically as private corporations, we find on analysis that this statement does not bear out the facts, because if this were true the present officials, who were the ones who operated the roads under private control, would be considered inefficient. The facts in the case are that we never had full Government operation of railroads. What we really did have was Government guaranty and private operation.

It is a well-known fact that as soon as the railroads are returned to private ownership under the provisions of the pending bill the roads must be granted an increase in freight rates in order that they may operate at a profit. It is also estimated that this increase will amount to $875,000,000, and by the time this increase is transferred to the consuming public it will amount to $3,000,000,000 or more. This in all probability will mean another increase in the cost of living.

The railroads of the country should be operated as a public service corporation for the benefit of the public and not for any particular group or class of people.

The only way that transportation charges can be reduced is to reduce the fixed charges, and this can be brought about only by reducing the outstanding bonded debt. Private owners of railroad property will never attempt to reduce the outstanding bonded debt, because to do so would have a tendency to bring about a reduction in freight rates and that, from a business standpoint, would be considered bad business.

I also want to call the attention of Congress to the wage question that has been disturbing the country for some time. I do not agree with those who have been giving out statements that workingmen are well or overpaid. On the contrary, it is well known by those who are familiar with conditions that certain classes, such as teachers, college professors, accountants, and bookkeepers, and men of fixed salaries, have received only a very slight increase in wages, and that the increase received by them is nowhere in proportion to the increased cost of living. They are not receiving the amount of wages that their education, experience, and ability should command, and there seems to be no disposition to increase their wages in an amount equal to the service they render. So much for the unorganized class of workers.

Now, let us consider briefly the better organized groups of labor, who, because of the very nature of their work and the dependence of the public upon them, are more in the public eye. Let us see whether or not they are overpaid. Everyone who is at all familiar with the wages paid to miners or railroad men is fully aware that this class of employees are not overpaid. If we take into consideration the hazard of their occupations, they are, in all probability, underpaid. If the hourly rate of wages paid these men is carefully scrutinized, it will be found that the wages paid them are not as high as wages paid to men in other industries. It is true that a small percentage of miners and certain railroad employees make a high monthly wage, but the men who make this high monthly wage are an exception. Notwithstanding this, these men are always pointed to as an example of the high wages paid miners and railroad men. The employees who make this high wage are invariably given wide publicity, but the conditions under which they make this high wage are never given in detail by any of the propagandists. The facts, as far as possible, are always kept from the public; however, it might be observed that notwithstanding the high wages that miners and railroad men are supposed to receive, there is very rarely, if ever, a surplus of labor either in the mines or on the railroads.

I now wish to call attention to the wages paid to miners in soft-coal regions prior to 1918 and 1919. Instead of these men receiving a high wage, they were receiving a very low wage. From 1913 to 1918 the average yearly wage was $873, or less than $75 per month. This wage includes the year of 1918. In 1918 the Ohio miners received a yearly wage of $1,364, or approximately $4.50 per day for 304 days. During this same period from 1907 to 1918 the cost of living had increased about 82 per cent.

The propagandists do not tell the public that the average hourly rate received by the 68 railroad crafts for 1918 was 48 cents per hour, or $1,416 per year. Thirty-six thousand officers and general officers were figured in this rate.

I want to call attention to the high wages of conductors, engineers, and some other railroad employees who are frequently discussed because of this high wage, and to show how this high monthly wage is made. This class of employees are paid so much per mile or so much per hour, and in order to make a high monthly wage these men must work the hours or its equivalent in miles.

Passenger engineers are paid from 5.60 cents to 6.60 cents per mile, depending on the weight of the locomotive; on its drivers. Freight engineers receive from 6.08 cents to 8 cents per mile, dependent on weight of locomotive. There are 11 classes of locomotives and as many different rates of pay. Passenger engineers on long divisions who make daily turnround trips, where their miles exceed their hours, such as men running on 150-mile divisions, or those who can make 5,000 miles per month, make a high monthly wage. Five thousand miles is equal to 420 eight-hour days, and engineers in passenger service, running the heaviest locomotive, getting the highest hourly rate, can make $330 per month.

Engineers in freight service running Mallet engines making 5,000 miles, or its equivalent in hours, would make $400 per month at 8 cents per mile. This wage can be made by only a small percentage of railway engineers, and it is unfair to refer to them as being representative of what railroad employees earn. The report of the 1916 eight-hour wage commission showed that only fourteen-hundredths of 1 per cent of engineers at that time made over $300 per month, showing that runs on which this high wage is made are scarce, and men who hold these runs are the oldest in the service, serving in their capacity from 20 to 35 years.

I have selected for comparison the highest-paid class of men in the railroad service to show how this high wage can be made. All men in railroad service, only those in passenger and fast-freight service must work the hours in order to earn a high wage.

It is unnecessary to go into detail about the wages paid to many of the other railway crafts. The increase they were granted by the Government was necessary to enable them to meet rising food prices that they might live; and because of the low wages many of these men received prior to the time that this increase was granted the said increase has been unfairly characterized as unwarranted. During the war, with a labor shortage making overtime necessary, the shopmen made a high monthly wage; but, now that the eight-hour day has been established, the wages of these men have been reduced 35 per cent. Some propagandists charge high prices to the high wages, but an examination of the increase of the cost of commodities up to 1918 will show that higher wages was necessary in order to meet high prices.

These figures will show the wages earned by the highest-paid employees and the number of eight-hour days worked in 1918. The operation of the eight-hour day has reduced the wages of the shopmen 33 per cent.

	Number of 8-hour days worked for year ending June 30, 1918.	Average pay per year 1918.
Passenger engineer	326	$2,512
Road freight engineer	375	2,481
Yard engineer	389	2,056
Passenger conductor	341	2,269
Road freight conductor	378	2,260
Yard conductor	380	1,885
Passenger brakeman	333	1,537
Road freight brakeman	388	1,537
Yard brakeman	410	1,685
Machinist	400	2,334
Boiler maker	419	2,417

The railroad eight-hour commission of 1916 made a report stating that the typical earnings of the eastern engineer was around $190 per month and that of the freight brakeman was $100. The report also showed that 25.52 per cent receive from $90 to $160 per month; 39.11 per cent receive from $160 to $210 per month; 14.69 per cent receive from $210 to $250; 3.55 per cent receive from $250 to $300; and fourteen-hundredths of 1 per cent receive $300 per month or over.

These figures show that the railroad employees who received a high wage for 1918 worked from 22 to 115 days per year more than men work in other industries. It can be readily seen that if men employed in the railroad industries worked the same number of days per month or year as men employed elsewhere they would not receive a high wage. On the contrary, if the highest paid railroad employees worked 26 days per month, the average number of days worked by men in other industries, their monthly wages would not be as high as other workmen.

Road employees who are obliged to maintain quarters on both ends of the road, living as they very often do as much away from home as at home, would have their monthly wages reduced in proportion to the number of days they are away from their homes. This is a condition never mentioned when computing the wages of men engaged in road service.

By singling out a small percentage of men employed in the various industries and showing the high wages these men make, instead of showing the average wage, it misrepresents the facts and creates a wrong impression in the public mind.

The following figures will show how under the provisions of this bill the overcapitalized and heretofore mismanaged roads will profit at the expense of the well managed:

	Miles of road operated.		Net earnings per mile.		Fixed charge per mile.		Net capitalization per mile.		Average net income on capital for 10 years.

The Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES A. FREAR,
OF WISCONSIN,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, the railroad bill has been put through the House without real comprehension of its terms by one-quarter of the House membership. Probably 10 per cent of the 400 Members voting would be a closer estimate of those who read the bill before voting for it. The Esch bill of 86 pages was placed on our desks the day debate began on the bill last November and was then rushed to the Senate. The Railroad Committee, including its distinguished chairman, my colleague, Mr. Esch, has the respect of the House, but I am answerable to my own judgment and conscience for my vote and do not intend to vote blindly on this far-reaching bill.

The conference report or compromise bill between the House bill and Senate bill now before us, is declared by Mr. BARKLEY of the committee to be entirely different from the Esch House bill or Cummins Senate bill. It was only available a few minutes before the five-hour debate began prior to the vote. The conference bill covers 120 printed pages, and in the 300 minutes devoted to debate several members of the committee occupied over half the time, so that 375 other Members out of the 400 voting had neither time to read the bill nor ask questions, but were told to swallow it whole, and it was whipped through the House without opportunity even to know its terms excepting on one or two important controverted sections brought out in the discussion.

With this situation, every legislator may properly look to those who are disinterested to understand the effect of the bill. It was stated in the debate that the railway companies begged the President to take over the roads during the war, and that it was the railroad's salvation and for the protection of the stockholders as well as for the handling of the war that they were turned over to the Government to operate. Many reforms were put in force by Government railway officials, but it is folly to say the record made by the Government in handling the railways during the war is any more of a test than was private operation during the war. I have no comment to make on common knowledge that railroad wreckers have fattened their purses and extorted untold millions from innocent stockholders and the public in the past, nor to discuss the fictitious valuations of railways on which earnings have been based under private management, nor on the statement made in debate that only 38 per cent of the railways were paying dividends before the enactment of the interstate-commerce law, and only 60 per cent of railway stocks were paying 6 per cent dividends prior to the war. These statements, if true, deserve careful consideration before deciding on the terms of this railway bill.

To the contention that Government control has been wasteful and expensive, Director General Hines and other public officers point to many economies effected in management and a consolidation of transportation units that would eventually bring order and a unit organization out of private unbusinesslike managements wherein competition and individual service ceased to exist many years ago. It is alleged that the roads were received from private owners during the war with worn-out equipment and shortage in rolling stock, and this equipment was replaced by the Government, together with a raise in wage, given to practically all the employees of the roads excepting higher officials, whose extremely liberal salaries were brought down to a more reasonable figure. Never before has Congress found it necessary or desirable to determine what minimum rate of profits shall be guaranteed to any business. I believe the precedent is unwise and improper, particularly as the only method of making good such guaranties is by giving to a railway monopoly created by law the power to charge the public enough more to make certain the profit, or possibly in future cases to guarantee some other business fixed profits from the Public Treasury. The precedent is dangerous. If it shall be found best to return the roads to private ownership with a guarantee, it is certainly necessary to have knowledge of the actual value of the roads, which we do not have to-day, and to determine what operating expenditures are justified before we guarantee a fixed percentage of profits. That has never been obtained, and we are required by this bill to go it blind.

WHAT A 25 PER CENT FREIGHT INCREASE MEANS TO THE PEOPLE.

Every Member of Congress and every consumer in the country is interested in the statement of Robert W. Wooley, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who says over his own signature that the railroad bill proposing to return these roads at this time to private hands means an immediate increase of freight rates of 25 per cent in order to meet guaranteed pledges to stockholders. Based on 1918 freight receipts, Mr. Wooley says this 25 per cent increase will mean $875,000,000 additional freight rates to the roads. But he adds "the shipper passes this along to the consumer and on back to the producer of the raw material, who has to stand the cost of transportation." This means every man, from the farmer and butcher and baker to the laborer in factory or office will pay his share in the food he eats and clothes he wears.

Director General Hines of railways publicly states that this 25 per cent increase is passed on to the final consumer in a ratio of 400 per cent increase, or that an increase of $875,000,000 in freight rates means $4,375,000,000 increased cost to the consumer. Increased costs of living will be paid annually under the direction by Congress to make this 5½ per cent guaranty. A further statement by tax experts that a 25 per cent increased freight means an increased cost to every consuming family of $215 a year on the average is startling, when the country is already struggling under heavy tax burdens and the high cost of living. Director General Hines corrects many of the misstatements made over comparative operating expense by the Government and private owners, and this is emphasized when it is known that Mr. Hines was receiving $77,210 a year as chairman of the Atchison road in 1917, whereas he is now working as Government Director General for $25,000 per year.

INCREASED FREIGHT RATES TO GUARANTEE $100,000 SALARIES.

Two hundred and odd railway officers, whose names I have, were receiving over $20,000 a year salary under private control, including J. M. Dickenson, receiver of the Rock Island, who pulled down $120,000 a year before the war. The least of these salaries is many times that of Members of Congress and much beyond the salaries of Cabinet members and justices of the Supreme Court. The consumers, who ultimately pay all the bills, are required under the terms of the conference bill to pay 25 per cent increase in freight rates in order to meet such items of cost under the 5½ and 6 per cent guaranty.

The statements of Mr. Woolley and Director General Hines have not been answered, to my knowledge. I do not see how they can be answered, and efforts to cover up the facts by the cry of "Government ownership," "Plumb plan," and other shouts of "wolf" do not answer the charge that a 25 per cent increase in freight rates is to occur, which will ultimately place an additional burden of over $4,000,000,000 on the consumers and producers of the country and add to the present high cost of living.

CLINCHING A HALF BILLION DOLLARS WASTE.

In the brief space allotted I can not discuss at length the fact that after Congress has appropriated in past years over a half billion dollars of the taxpayers' money for inland waterways, and during the war has spent many millions of dollars for boats to run the rivers, that this bill proposes to turn all these matters over to private ownership and to the War Department. that notoriously is unbusinesslike and incompetent to handle the matter. Instead of using waterways to reduce freight costs we are taxing the people to aid favored private interests. The injustice of the long-and-short-haul clause that throttles many communities under private railway control is not relieved under this bill, so far as I can understand, and the labor provision, which has been one of the debated sections of the bill, seems satisfactory to no one. Many injustices appear in the bill, as I view it, but that which overshadows all others is the fact that an enormous increase in the cost of freight is about to occur in order to guarantee 5½ and 6 per cent on railway securities, a large portion of which are represented by "water," according to railway experts.

If the President insists upon returning the roads on March 1, as threatened, let the responsibility rest with him; but I am more interested in the ultimate result of this legislation, as predicted by two acknowledged disinterested railway experts—Mr. Woolley and Mr. Hines—than I am by threats that the President will turn the roads into bankruptcy unless we swallow this conference bill.

GUARANTEEING PROFITS IS A DANGEROUS PRECEDENT.

There is little difference in principle in guaranteeing a 5½ per cent return on railways and guaranteeing fixed profits on the value of farm lands, wheat, or of stocks of corporations generally. In the face of investments by the public in Liberty bonds, which on a 3 to 4 per cent interest rate have depreciated in some cases 10 per cent of their face value, we are asked to compel the subscribers to those Liberty bonds and present holders to pay enormously increased freight earnings in order to guarantee 5½ to 6 per cent to the holders of railway securities.

Bills were introduced this session to pay a small bonus to the soldiers who served at $30 a month during the war, to help them in getting a start. The boys took chances with their lives in the service, and it is an obligation that can never be repaid. We all agree to that, and yet when it is proposed to put through Congress some bill giving help to the soldiers, we have been met with the plea that the Public Treasury is confronted by many necessary governmental expenditures. It is certainly easier for the consuming public to pay the soldiers a small bonus through the Federal Treasury than by a 25 per cent increase in freight rates during future years to guarantee 6 per cent earnings on railways. One covers the exact amount, the other costs the consumer five times the actual freight increase.

I have briefly pointed out my understanding of a bill that has been given slight consideration by the House and has had presented against it what I believe to be insuperable objections from unprejudiced railway experts in the employ of the Government, as evidenced by the statements of Interstate Commerce Commissioner Wooley and Railroad Director General Hines. These men have disclosed the gross injustice that will come to the consumers of the country, and such objections must be met or we may expect to see a revolution of public sentiment, which will reach out to an eventual permanent control of the roads. I submit that the public interest is equally involved in the conference bill and I can not vote for a bill which in effect is condemned by the high, disinterested public officials named and which bill no Member of the House outside of the committee has had opportunity to study or even carefully read.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIS J. HULINGS,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 6, 1920,

On conference report on railroad bill (H. R. 10453).

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I voted against the antistrike provision of the Esch bill and supported the Anderson amendment for the reason that I think any man or group of men has a right to quit their employment and because I believe that punitive legislation would not be workable, since you could not put great masses of men in jail if they should strike.

I shall vote for the conference report because I think it a great measure, that will give the country better railroad facilities and provide methods by which all disputes can be settled fairly and justly, giving no just cause for strikes.

During Government control the Government guaranteed that it would pay the roads rentals equal to the average net income of the roads for the three years before the war. The conference report continues these guaranties for the next six months and that wages shall not be reduced during that time.

The charges that by the report 6 per cent net returns are guaranteed by the Government to the roads are without foundation.

Now, what are the facts?

The guaranty, so called, is merely the agreement that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall fix rates that will give the roads a fair return for the capital invested, and that 5½ per cent shall be a fair return.

But when it comes to "fixing the rates" it is perfectly obvious that all competitive rates must be equal, and that roads through a thickly populated district would at equal rates make far greater profits than the roads through a sparsely populated district, and if the rates were fixed so that the weak road would live the strong road would be getting too great profits.

So the design of the bill is to fix rates which will enable well-managed roads through the sparse districts to pay 5½ per cent (a fair return) on the capital invested and to require the roads that can make more than 5½ per cent (a fair return) on the capital invested to give back to the Government (the public) one-half of the excess over 6 per cent, and this excess may be loaned to the weak roads at 6 per cent on giving approved security.

But the Government guarantees nothing, except that the commission shall fix rates to give a fair return for capital invested, or 5½ per cent.

And the "capital invested" does not mean the face value of the stock and bonds, that may have been "watered," but the actual value of the property ascertained by the commission by investigations now being carried on under authority of law.

The report is the meeting of many minds upon a very difficult problem by men who are beyond all reproach, who have given months of study to the various arguments of farmers, bankers, railroad workers, and employers.

The labor leaders who are in favor of Government ownership or the Plumb plan, or continuance of operation of the roads by the Government, are not in favor of any plan which puts the roads back into the hands of the owners.

The memorial of the labor leaders protesting against the conference report was discussed at a meeting of the labor leaders and Members of Congress who had voted for the Anderson amendment at which I was present. This memorial protests that the pending bill violates the fundamental principles of the American Government; that it guarantees exclusive privileges to the investors in railways; that the common good is prostituted to establish the private interests of the holders of the railway securities.

Now, if I believed the bill did any one of these things I would be the last man in this House to vote for it.

The "public good" ought to be our chief concern.

Long since we learned that the Government must fix rates and regulations to protect the public from the greed of the railroads, and so the Interstate Commerce Commission was established.

When the Government took over the roads, it increased wages and operating expenses that the railroads under the old rates could not possibly pay, but the Government out of the Public Treasury paid the deficit.

Now, when the roads go back into private ownership the commission must increase the old rates at least equal to what the Government charged.

How much shall they increase them? Everybody knows that the railroads constantly need new capital for improvements and betterments, and that the investing public will not lend money on the bonds or buy the stock of the railroads unless they get a reasonably sure fair return.

What is a fair return?

The bill says 5½ per cent. Who will say this is excessive? I have some doubt whether 5½ per cent will induce the investing public to lend their money at this rate.

But how does the railroad get this fair return? By a guaranty of the Government? Not at all; but by rates that shall be fixed which, with reasonable arrangement, will enable the roads to secure such net income.

There seems to me nothing in this or in the bill that grants "exclusive privileges" or violates the Constitution.

There are some criticisms of the labor provisions that I think are well founded. Thus in section 304, paragraph 1, three members representing the employees and subordinate officials are to be appointed by the President out of a group of not less than six nominees, whose nomination shall be made in such manner as the commission shall prescribe; yet, in section 605, if these nominations are not made within 30 days after the passage of this act the President shall appoint whomsoever he chooses.

Now, the labor group can not nominate six nominees until after the commission has held hearings and promulgated the methods of making such nominees as described in paragraph 5, section 300, and if it should happen that 30 days should elapse before these regulations were promulgated then the labor group might be represented on the board by such persons as the President might choose to appoint. This objection is not vital, for the President would undoubtedly appoint representative labor men, but the labor leaders regard this very jealously. I think it could easily be remedied to meet their objection, which seems to be well founded.

The criticism of section 303, made by the leaders, is not well founded in my opinion. The leaders in their argument claim that 5 per cent of the 2,000,000 railway workers are unorganized. Five per cent of 2,000,000, or 1,000, and section 303 provides that upon the written petition "signed by 100 unorganized employees" the adjustment board may decide any dispute not decided between the carrier and its employees, so that it would appear that not more than 10 such groups of not less than 100 of the "unorganized employees" could present requests, instead of, as the leaders say, 20,000 such groups, nor do I see how such a provision for the recognition of complaints of railroad workers who do not belong to the union can be regarded as "permission or encouragement to disregard an agreement along the orderly methods of procedure which have been long established between the carriers and organized railroad workers," especially since in all probability there are no existing agreements made between the carriers and the unorganized workers. Besides, there is not "a failure to designate and treat with the standard recognized organizations," representing as the labor leaders say, approximately 95 per cent of all the employees because the mere designation of the unorganized labor by name would impliedly designate organized labor, if it were not otherwise named, but the fact is that in section 303 the chief executive or subordinate officials of any organizations of employees are distinctly named.

I believe the criticism of the labor leaders of section 306 is well taken, and that there is no reason why a man who has had long experience in dealing with the questions that would come up before the labor board should be required to give up his rights as a member of his organization and his craft, or that railroad managers with large experience in dealing with labor troubles should become, by reason of such classification, ineligible.

If the President should appoint three men acquainted with the railroad business and three men representing the workers and three men representing the public it would look to me as a real effort to assure a fair and just tribunal.

I am of the opinion that the labor leaders' criticism of paragraph b, section 307, is just and that the paragraph should be rewritten so as to give the labor board, upon its own motion, if it is of the opinion that the dispute is likely substantially to interrupt commerce, to hear and decide all disputes which the employers and the employees can not themselves decide, but not to set aside the decision of the adjustment board.

The adjustment board, established by agreement between the workers and carriers, is authorized to settle all disputes of every kind.

The labor board appointed by the President, three men from six persons named by the carriers, three men from six persons named by the workers, and three men to represent the public, only has authority to settle disputes regarding grievances or working conditions. It has no authority to settle disputes with respect to wages or salaries, except when the adjustment board has failed to act and except when the labor board is of the opinion that the decision of the adjustment board involves an increase of wages likely to require a change of rates.

This last exception should be eliminated, though, of course, I understand that the adjustment board having exclusive control of wages might become unduly extravagant, and the exception noted is designed to be a check.

The pending bill is not destructive of the constitutional privileges and liberties of the railroad workers which they claim that it is. On the contrary, I think that the bill is an effort to arrive at a just decision of the disputes that arise between employer and employees, and it is the constitutional right of Congress, in the interest of the public, to take the necessary measures to protect the public from the great loss and injury and suffering that would follow the paralysis of industries consequent upon tying up the railroads in case of failure of the railroad workers to secure such wages as they desire should strike.

There is no doubt in my mind of the authority of Congress to provide against such a contingency but relying upon the sense of justice and the patriotic spirit of American workingmen the bill is an effort through boards of conciliation to reach an equitable and just decision and a square deal in any given case, as between the contending parties, in the belief that when the public and the workman and the employers get a square deal there never will be any appeal to the "strike."

The more I study this report the more I am satisfied that it will work out to the public welfare, and I believe that in a short time the railroad workers will be warmest in its praise.

The way to prevent strikes is to remove the causes. Common sense and the square deal will do more than punitive legislation, and I believe this bill opens the way.

The Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OSCAR E. BLAND,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, for many months the two Committees on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House and Senate have labored with the problem of how best to solve the railroad question. The President came to Congress after the close of the war, and while speaking of the railroad question threw up his hands and asked Congress to solve the problem for him. Government control has been an expensive undertaking for the taxpayers of the United States. I voted to put the railroads under Government control, because I deemed it necessary in order that our tremendous war preparations would not be handicapped by a broken-down or poorly coordinating transportation system.

It has cost us $700,000,000 a year, notwithstanding the fact that under Government ownership we have enormously increased freight and passenger rates. The wages of the railroad employees have been advanced from time to time. The public has frequently complained that they were receiving too much. It is possible that some are receiving a more adequate wage than others, but if you will compare their wages with the cost of living, I do not believe you can honestly say that they are receiving too much, and I know that a great many of them are receiving too little.

When the Esch bill came before the House before, I could not have supported it in the form in which it was presented, because I believed that the antistrike provision which it contained was not conducive to a fair or permanent settlement of the labor question, and I did not believe that any legislative body had the right to say that men did not have the inherent right to quit work. I voted for the Anderson amendment, and it will be recalled that the Anderson amendment struck out the antistrike clause and substituted the plan of conciliation and provided that grievances would go to conciliatory boards. I have always believed that if the employer and the employee can have a fairly constituted and fairly regulated tribunal in which they are represented and interested to which they can submit their difficulties that it will always be possible for them to agree. Public sentiment is the strongest force in American political and economic life to-day, and public sentiment would make it almost certain that the honest, fair decision of such a tribunal as I have referred to would necessarily be accepted. The Anderson amendment carried.

The Esch bill was passed in the House and the Cummins bill was passed in the Senate. The Cummins bill contained the antistrike clause. The bills were, while attempting to accomplish the same purpose, differing very much in their manner of settling the questions.

A conference committee of both Houses was appointed in accordance with our rules and they labored for several weeks to meet upon a common ground satisfactory to the two Houses and at the same time trying to render justice to the employees of the roads, the stockholders, and the public at large. I am frank to say to you that everything in this bill does not meet with my entire approval, and, in my judgment, every other Member of the House and Senate could say the same thing; but legislation covering so many questions and permitting of so many different solutions and attempts at solutions must necessarily, in some of its features, partake of the nature of compromise. It has been stated that the Government in this bill guarantees certain earnings to the railroads. This is not a correct statement, but it does direct and authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to levy tariff rates sufficiently high that railroads may earn 5½ per cent on the actual valuation of their property—not on watered stock but upon actual value. If the Government had never taken over the railroads, if we had never interfered with their wage scale or their tariff rates I could not have brought myself to the position of supporting a separate bill guaranteeing to the railroads any earnings any more than I could guarantee earnings to a great many other quasi public enterprises, but it is a different problem which confronts us to-day. If the railroads were turned back to private ownership and wages remained where they are it would be necessary to increase the tariff rates in order to make up the difference, which the Government is paying to-day. Unless the cost of living is reduced I am of the opinion that wages will have to be increased in some instances. This again makes it necessary to guarantee increase of rates or else suffer a decrease in wages or the bankruptcy and failure of the railroads, with the consequent suffering to the public.

It must be remembered that the railroads of America are a tremendously large part of our industrial life. They are the very arteries of our whole commercial system. We own a third of the railroads of the world and they have been the most efficiently managed, have shown the greatest improvement, and given the best service of any railroads in the world. We can not afford to permit our industrial life to be paralyzed at any time, and much less so when we are just emerging from the unsettled conditions following this terrible war.

I believe the railroads should be turned back to their owners for a great many reasons unnecessary to enumerate at this time, but chief of which is that I want to get away as soon as possible from the unnatural and burdensome condition which was made necessary by the war. In authorizing tariff rates so as to guarantee earnings we thus make it possible for the wage earner to maintain his wage scale. You can not expect big wages from bankrupt railroads. Some of the railroads have been earning more than they are guaranteed by this bill and some of them have been earning less. This bill provides the excess profits shall go to the weaker roads, thus maintaining their efficiency and the continued wage of the employee. The recapturing of earnings is not, in my judgment, a very good legislative policy to apply to our industrial life under ordinary circumstances, and only the exigencies of this case to which I have briefly referred permits me to support that feature of the bill. I know the public in general will favor it, and I know the employees of the railroads will favor it, and most assuredly the owners of the weaker railroads will support it. It is ordinarily a dangerous doctrine, however, to take away from the thrifty and the efficient that which it honestly earns and give to the weak and inefficient. Since the public is so intimately and vitally connected with the railroad life of the Nation, and since the present financial problem is so acute in this critical period of the Nation's life, I am willing to support this uncertain economic principle with the reservation that it shall not be used as a precedent for other business enterprises.

Every day I have letters and telegrams from the owners and employees of the stone mills and quarries and from the owners and employees of the coal mines of my district deploring the terrible lack of cars for the shipment of coal and stone. I have spent much time in the Railroad Administration offices endeavoring to get the largest possible allotment of cars for my section of the country. I think I obtained some results, but I learned definitely that since the close of the war the railroads and the Government both had ceased to build new cars and that hundreds of thousands of old cars were being junked each year. The future car supply looked dark indeed. The Government could hold out no hope. Its Treasury is empty and our railroad adventure has been an expensive one. The railroads could not and would not make improvements, because the value of railroad securities was an uncertainty. This bill provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission may order and require cars to be built by the railroads to take care of the needs of the public. It also provides that the Government may loan to the railroads out of a sinking fund arising from excess profits sufficient money to buy rolling stock. This bill provides for the things my constituents demand. It will give them better railroad service. It will guarantee the continued operation of the railroads, and it will permit the employees to get adequate wages. It contains no antistrike provision. It establishes a tribunal to settle the difficulties of labor. It guarantees that for six months there shall be no reduction of wages. It also permits the equalization of freight rates on coal shipped to Chicago from the Indiana and Illinois fields. The Indiana coal industry has long suffered from an unfair rate fixing in this regard. These provisions certainly meet with the approval of all parties concerned whom I represent.

The President has stated that the railroads would be turned back to their owners on the 1st day of March or within the next 8 or 10 days. Unless suitable legislation were passed, this would mean confusion and pandemonium, strikes, crippled industries, bankruptcy, and financial ruin. If I should vote against this bill to-day and a majority of the Members of the House would do the same, what would be the result? There are a great many men in the country who are opposed to this bill, most of them because they do not understand its provisions. Some of them think that it is unfair to the public because it permits increased freight rates. Others think that it is unfair to labor. I have talked with a number of representatives of labor, and they have not been able to give me any justification for the statement that it is unfair to labor. I helped to take out of the bill the provision which was unfair to labor. This bill guarantees them their job and guarantees them their wages, and those who oppose it and the employees who oppose it will tell you, if they are frank with you, that their objection arises from their belief in Government ownership of railroads. At this late date, with the President about to turn them back to their owners, it has passed the time when you can contend for Government ownership. No man on either floor of this Congress has offered any substitute or amendment to either bill which if supported would bring Government ownership, so it becomes a question with me as to whether I will vote for this conference report with all its good provisions and its few objectionable features, or to throw the whole question into chaos and confusion, which is certain to come if this report is defeated.

No motion to recommit this report has been made which offers any solution to any of the difficulties presented. Under the rules there can be but one motion to recommit, and the party who is entitled to make that motion in this instance is a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee who is opposed to the bill. None of them have seen fit to make a motion with a recommendation, and the one motion to recommit that was made, and therefore the only one that can be made, was made by the gentleman from Kentucky, which was merely a motion to recommit without instructions, which if passed would throw the whole matter back into confusion and chaos. I regret that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], or the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], or the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], any one of whom had the power or right to make a motion to recommit, did not make the motion to recommit with specific instructions correcting certain features of the bill, which, in my judgment, might have been slightly improved upon, but we understand why this motion to recommit was made and made indefinite and not specific, and we can understand what the men who voted for this motion to recommit are going to say to their constituents as to why they voted for it. They will in each instance say that it was to correct the very thing their constituents complained of. A vote for the motion to recommit was exactly equivalent to a vote against the bill, and yet a great many men find it easy to support the motion to recommit and yet support the bill. This is a species of political hide and seek that I am not willing to play. I believe this report represents the best possible compromise effort under the circumstances, and I wonder, when all circumstances are considered, how it was possible for the two committees of the two Houses to finally come to an agreement upon such an important question and enact into law a bill with so few imperfections.

The Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. L. S. ECHOLS,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. ECHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I have two excellent reasons for voting for this bill. The first is that it is, in the main, proper, constructive legislation, correcting the evil of further operation of the railroads by the Federal Government, to which I am earnestly opposed; and, second, under the so-called guaranty clause my section of the country will unquestionably be benefited. The experience the country has had in the past two years under Government control of the railroads has been an expensive one. It has cost the country a million dollars per day for every day the Government has operated the railroads. We are now called upon to pay approximately $700,000,000 out of the Public Treasury for this experience, which should have terminated before this time. In addition to that, we have been and are now paying an increase of 50 per cent in passenger rates and 25 per cent in freight rates. Like every other Member of the House, in going through the bill, I have found specific clauses which do not altogether meet with my approval, but no two intelligent men who are capable of working out a great piece of constructive legislation, as this is, could in a bill of more than 100 printed pages agree upon every specific clause therein. This legislation, like all constructive legislation, is the result of great minds meeting together and compromising. The conference committee that presents it to us is entitled to the everlasting gratitude of the country.

It has been suggested that the $700,000,000 that we are now called upon to pay for Government operation of the railroads is one of the prices we paid for winning the war. If that is true, then it is well worth the price. But, in my judgment, we have learned a great lesson from Government operation of the railroads that has reached the heart of the country, and that is the fallacy of the Government undertaking to do those things that should be done by private initiative and private capital. That lesson has been so expensive and so well learned that it will not be forgotten by the present generation at least. That lesson is also worth the price we have paid.

I find but few in my section of the country in favor of further Government control of the railroads, except that class of people who believe in the nationalization of all industries, and that class constitutes a small per cent of the population—far less than it was before our experience with Government control.

There has been much said about the so-called guaranty clause found in the bill. I fail to find anywhere in this bill where the Government guarantees to any railroad either 5½ or 6 or any other per cent upon the value of its stock or the true value of its property. There is no such guaranty. There is a contingent fund provided that is made up of the excess of 6 per cent earned by the strong roads of the country that is to be placed in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission as a trustee, which may be loaned to the weaker roads for equipment, and so forth. There is no tax levied upon the people to create this fund. I would vote for the bill if I lived on the line of the most prosperous railroad in the country. But here comes my second reason for supporting the bill. It may be that it is somewhat personal and somewhat selfish upon my part to take the view that I do, but that element is only a part of human nature.

My congressional district is largely traversed by the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad and its branches. We have one of the greatest coal fields in the world, and the coal we produce is of the best quality in the world. The transportation of coal from those fields depends upon the ability of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad to carry it. That road is what is known as one of the weaker roads. It traverses mountainous regions, and was therefore expensive to construct and is expensive to operate. Those who oppose this provision overlook the fact that the Government, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, fixes the price the railroad can charge for transporting every passenger and every ton of freight over its lines. The railroad has nothing to say about the rates it can charge for transportation. This contingent fund will enable roads like the Chesapeake & Ohio to live, pay its employees reasonable wages, and accommodate the shippers who are compelled to depend upon it. Whatever will give to the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad the power to haul the coal and other industrial products from my district will give support to the coal producer, coal miner, and other laborer in that district that which he can not otherwise obtain—that is, the right to live.

We have had a rather severe and costly lesson in the Government control of that road within the last few months. Thirty thousand coal cars were taken from the eastern coal pool during the strike and used in shipping coal to the far West. My information is that to this good day that a very great number of those cars have not been returned. The per cent of coal cars allotted to the coal producers in my district has ranged from as low as 23 per cent to about 60 per cent since the strike. Government control to a great degree is responsible for this condition. Every employer of labor and every employee in my district should be delighted that the roads are going back to private ownership with the contingent fund to help the weaker roads. The short-line railroads that run out from the main trunk line into the coal regions must be generously treated by the Government.

Upon that depends the prosperity and happiness of the people who live among the hills. Receiverships for railroads which would come without the aid of this fund from the excess of the more prosperous roads would mean receiverships for the coal companies of my district, and not only for the coal companies but for many other industries therein. Receiverships for coal companies and other industries mean suffering among the laborers who are employed by such industries. Thirty per cent of the coal produced in the country is consumed by the railroads. The railroads can not live without public support, and upon the economic operation of the railroads depends, to a large extent, the success and prosperity of every other business institution in the country.

When the Esch railroad bill was before the House in November, I voted for what was known as the Anderson labor amendment. I did so in the full belief that it was the best proposition presented at that time, and in voting for this bill I do not feel that there is any injustice being done the employees of the railroads throughout the country. It provides for adjustment boards, to be selected by the employees of the railroads and the railroads themselves, to settle their own difficulties. If they can not agree, then there is a labor board provided, to be appointed by the President of the United States, who is the proper party to appoint such board, to which an appeal may be taken. The public is to be represented upon that board. This is the first time in the history of such legislation that the public has been represented. I have no doubt but that the representatives of the public will be fair. That board is given general powers to hear disputes and make findings, but there is not one line in the bill that provides for compulsory adherence to the findings of that board. If the railroad employees are not satisfied with the findings of the board there is nothing providing criminal liability for their failure to do so—no fines, no penalties. The enforcement of its findings depends upon public opinion, and no organization, not even the Government itself, can afford to run counter to public opinion. Its mandates are stronger and more effective than any act of any Congress or rulings of any board. There being no penalties provided for failure of organizations to comply with the findings of the board, I can see no reasonable objection thereto.

Public opinion has been instrumental in settling every great industrial dispute that has taken place in this country, and public opinion will continue to be instrumental in settling them. There is no way under the sun by which either the railroads or labor organizations can escape the force of public opinion. If the board finds for the railroads and its finding is unjust, public opinion will compel the railroads to follow its mandate. When reason asserts itself among those who are in favor of nationalization of the railroads of the country they will find that this provision in the railroad bill will be the one that is most wholesome for them. When disputes arise between individuals they are compelled to go to the courts for adjustment, and when the court renders judgment the parties to the controversy are compelled to abide by that judgment, no matter whether it is satisfactory to them or not. Here is set up a court of arbitration to recommend the adjustment of disputes, but there is no compulsion.

It is useless to advocate at this time the nationalization of the railroads and other industries of the country. Public opinion opposes such, and public opinion can not at this time be overcome. Nationalization of industries and ownership of the railroads by Governments in countries where the same have been tested have proven failures. Only a few months ago I had the privilege of traveling upon railroads long owned by Governments, and I never saw the time since I first stepped upon a railroad car that transportation was so inadequate in this country as it was in those countries in which I rode upon government-controlled or government-owned railroad lines.

The difficulties encountered in this legislation have been stupendous; the controversy has been long and wearisome, but from those difficulties and out of that controversy has come a splendid piece of sound and constructive legislation which I am sure the country will welcome with profound relief.

Federal Control of Railroads.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOREN E. WHEELER,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920,

On the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to analyze this bill in detail. I simply desire to touch upon a few of its more important features, especially those in which the public and the press seem to be most vitally interested.

No one, I believe, has claimed perfection for this measure, but the President has issued a proclamation turning the railroads back to their former owners on March 1 next, and immediate legislation is necessary. To turn them loose in their present demoralized state, without defining their status, would spell bankruptcy for many lines and produce industrial and financial chaos throughout the country.

To avoid just such a disaster, the committees of the House and Senate have labored for months to produce a measure that would prove just to the public, just to the employees, and just to the employers. That this bill upon which we are about to vote will in a great measure meet that standard, I have no doubt.

CRITICS WOULD DECEIVE PUBLIC.

It has been erroneously, and I fear maliciously, charged by some that this bill throttles labor; that it was framed to meet the ideas and wishes solely of the railroads and the owners of railroad securities. Nothing could be further from the facts, but I regret to say I find many people apparently believing those statements.

They have not read this bill. They have simply been deceived by the overenthusiastic friends of Government ownership.

NO COMPULSORY ARBITRATION.

As a matter of fact, this bill simply provides machinery for the voluntary arbitration of wage disputes between the railroads and their employees. The decisions of the wage adjustment board created under this measure are simply advisory. They are not compulsory.

The board can only hear both sides to a controversy, conduct an investigation to ascertain the facts, and then render and publish its decision.

EMPLOYEES MAY STRIKE.

If not satisfied with that decision, there is nothing in the bill that prevents the men from quitting work, singly or collectively. The only weapon in the hands of the board is its power to publish the results of its investigation—to acquaint the public with the true facts regarding the controversy. This alone constitutes a safeguard for the interests of all and insurance against injustice to the employee and employer.

Any decision in or settlement of a controversy so vitally affecting the public as would a threatened tie-up of our transportation facilities must be sufficiently just to stand public scrutiny. A decision of any court or tribunal and the facts supporting the same that can not stand the light of publicity must fail for lack of merit.

LABOR CLAUSE NOT PERFECT.

I do not agree with some who contend the section treating with wage controversies is the best that can be framed, nor do I agree with others who charge it with being "unworkable." At this time, however, with the leaders and Members of both House and Senate presenting and pressing many divergent views on the subject, a compromise was necessary if an agreement was ever to be reached.

The many delicate questions involved in this new form of legislation was confusing to even the ablest Members of both branches of Congress. I am confident, however, that out of their efforts, and as a result of experience which will make known needed changes, this and succeeding Congresses will be able to perfect some smoothly working wage-adjustment machinery. Such a result is earnestly desired by the majority of our people, and it was with a view to such an outcome that Congress was prompted to take some action at this time.

THE SO-CALLED "GUARANTY."

In addition to those who have attempted to stir up opposition to the return of the railroads to private ownership and who were exercised about the so-called "antistrike" clause and charging the curtailment of the rights of the employee, there are other equally unscrupulous critics. They allege the public is to be saddled with a tremendous burden by the Government being compelled to guarantee earnings to the extent of 5½ per cent on watered stock.

They know that is not true and are fully aware of the effect of their charges, but evidently believe the means justifiable if the end were to be continued Government operation. As a matter of fact, the Government practically guarantees no more than it has been paying under Government operation.

ALLOW ONLY FAIR RETURN.

This bill simply sets forth that it is the opinion of the Government that a railroad should be allowed to earn 5½ per cent, and not more than 6 per cent, on the money invested in and represented by the actual value of the property. The excess earnings are to be converted into a revolving fund to be used for the purpose of meeting the deficit of the weaker lines and the purchase of needed equipment for those properties.

It directs the Interstate Commerce Commission to adjust the rates so that a railroad honestly and economically managed may be allowed to earn that amount on its real value and not the paper value of its watered stock. And this value is to be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, appointed by the President and not by the railroads.

When you consider that from these earnings of 5½ per cent there must be paid city, State, and Federal taxes you will see that the interest allowed the railroads will be less than that paid holders of our Liberty bonds.

RELIEVES GOVERNMENT OF BURDEN.

It is simply a continuation for a period of six months of practically the same return which the railroads now receive from the Government. The obligations of the Government are not increased. To the contrary, there is under this bill a date when these obligations cease.

Those who oppose the return of the roads to private owners are simply advocating the continuance of those obligations which have been a heavy drain upon our National Treasury.

GOVERNMENT OPERATION COSTLY.

In the brief period of Government control the railroads have cost the Government nearly $700,000,000. That is the net loss to the Government. And then, too, this big deficit has been piled up in spite of increased rates, extensive business, and the minimum expenditures for maintenance. A comparatively small amount of money was expended by the Government for repairs and new equipment.

When the railroads were taken over by the Government the equipment was in good condition. To-day, upon the eve of returning them to private owners, even those in charge admit their demoralized condition.

Conservative estimates by experts who have considered this phase of the railroad situation place the amount necessary to restore the properties to their former condition at between five and six billion dollars. This expenditure will be necessary if the roads are to continue to function and our transportation system maintained.

GOVERNMENT SHORT OF FUNDS.

To ask the Government to expend this amount just now is out of the question. It could not do it without a complete demoralization of its finances.

Under private ownership, and with legislation permitting reasonable earnings on the real value of the properties, these funds may be obtained from investors in securities.

Thus, Mr. Sp- ker, in supporting this bill, which I consider one of the most constructive pieces of legislation attempted by this Congress, I consider I am not only voting to rid the Government of an exceedingly heavy burden but I am giving approval to a plan for the rehabilitation of our transportation systems, which have become demoralized by a brief period of Government and political control.

The League of Nations.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK MURPHY,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 25, 1920.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks on the subject of the League of Nations, I shall adopt as a part of my remarks an extract from a paper which I received, issued by the League for the Preservation of American Independence, which in effect applies particularly to the South and the southern people, but which, in my judgment, would apply with equal force to the people throughout the United States, and is of the deepest concern to all American citizens. The article to which I refer reads as follows:

LET US HAVE PEACE.

The President told Congress, on November 12, 1919, that the war was ended and its object accomplished.

This was true then, and it is true now. But the President refuses to end the state of war, and surrender the restrictive war-time measures still in his hands, which menace farm, shop, and office in every section of the country.

He refuses to end the state of war unless the Nation shall enter into a contract with 32 nations—many of which are brown, yellow, or black—under which our domestic policies and foreign relations shall be subjected to the control of these nations, and American troops be placed at their disposal for use in Europe, Asia, and Africa to be employed in never-ceasing warfare.

A coalition of patriotic southern and northern Senators has refused thus to surrender American sovereignty or to expend American blood and tax money.

These Senators have sought to modify the contract so that we shall be enabled to do our international duty as our Nation thinks best, without placing the United States in Europe's hands to be dealt with as Europe pleases.

But the President refuses to Americanize the covenant and declines to curtail the supersovereign powers of the league. He must have his league or there will be no peace, he says in effect.

The Nation must bow down to the President's league or continue suspended in a state of war. He thus hangs up America by the thumbs and coolly awaits its repentance and acquiescence.

WILL THE SOUTH STAND FOR THIS?

Out of that great section of the country came most of the creative genius that secured our independence, founded our Government, and framed our institutions.

What, now, would those great southern statesmen say to the proposal that their work—the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States—be so far undone that the Old World shall again be given control of the New?

Would they approve the surrender at Versailles of the independence they had won at Yorktown? Will you?

What, then, is to be done?

This:

Let Congress declare the state of war ended.

Let the Senate declare the terms upon which we will enter again into relations with Germany and Austria.

Let Congress declare our intention to avoid foreign entanglements, as Washington and other Presidents have advised, and redeclare our independence of foreign control.

Then let us have peace!

If you approve, say so promptly to your Senators and Representatives at Washington.

LEAGUE FOR THE PRESERVATION OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE (INC.).

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Spanish-American and Philippine War Pension Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. ROBSION,
OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 25, 1920.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, our Committee on Pensions by unanimous vote on July 19, 1919, reported the House pension bill, H. R. 2, which provides that all persons who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the Chinese relief expedition, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now or may hereafter be suffering from any mental or physical disability of a permanent character not the result of their own vicious habits, which so incapacitates them for the performance of manual labor as to render them unable to earn a support, shall, upon making due proof of the said facts, be entitled to receive a pension of not less than $12 per month and not more than $30 per month, according to the degree of disability to earn a support; or if any such soldier or sailor without disability reaches the age of 62 years, he will receive $12 per month; 68 years, $18 per month; 72 years, $24 per month; and 75 years, $30 per month.

DOES NOT REPEAL OTHER PENSION LAWS.

Under present pension laws any such soldier or sailor who lost his health or was injured in the service may receive a pension, but in order to secure a pension he must prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions that his disabilities were contracted in the service and in the line of duty. Under these laws many soldiers and sailors of the Spanish-American and Philippine Wars are now receiving from $6 per month to $100 per month for said injuries and disabilities incurred in the service and in the line of duty. This bill does not repeal any of the said laws, and any of said soldiers or sailors who are receiving less than $30 per month may apply for an increase up to $30 per month under this bill.

NECESSITY FOR THIS LEGISLATION.

I have shown that under present pension laws no soldier or sailor of the Spanish-American or Philippine war or Chinese expedition can secure a pension unless his injury or disability was contracted in the service and in the line of duty, and this fact must be proven to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions, and the Pension Department demands that the soldier or sailor prove this by a hospital record while in the service.

Thousands of special bills are filed each year by Members of Congress to secure pensions for these soldiers and sailors, whose claims have been turned down by the Pension Department because they are unable to furnish a hospital record of their injury or disability while in the service. Our committee before reporting this bill took a great deal of evidence, and it was disclosed in this evidence that a very large percentage of soldiers who served in Cuba or in the Philippines contracted some character of disease and their health was greatly impaired because of the climate and other conditions. It also was disclosed that in a great many instances no hospital record was kept or preserved of these soldiers having received treatment while in the service, and again many of the diseases contracted did not fully manifest themselves for some years after their term of service had ended. Under the ruling of the Pension Department all of these men are and will be denied pensions except by special act or unless this bill is passed.

The testimony further discloses that thousands of these soldiers and sailors are incapacitated wholly or in part to perform any labor, and they are without means to support themselves and their families. The Spanish-American War veterans and others are required to contribute hundreds of thousands of dollars annually to take care of these soldiers and sailors. This rich and powerful Nation should not compel these soldiers and sailors to become objects of charity, neither should any particular organization be required to take care of them. We honor our Nation and honor ourselves to care for and provide for our defenders when they can not provide and care for themselves. The fact that there are thousands of these soldiers and sailors who need help justifies this legislation.

DISABILITY NEED NOT TO HAVE BEEN IN THE SERVICE OR IN LINE OF DUTY.

In July, 1862, Congress passed an act to pension the soldiers of the Civil War for injuries or disabilities incurred in the service in line of duty. In 1890 Congress passed another general law for Civil War soldiers which is substantially the same as this bill. In fact, this bill was patterned after the act of 1890, except this bill provides for a pension from $12 to $30 per month, while the act of 1890 gave the Civil War soldiers pensions at the rate of $6 to $12 per month. By an act of 1897, in behalf of Civil War soldiers and sailors, age was recognized, but no Civil War soldier could get more than $20 per month on account of age, and then he would have to be 75 years of age. In 1912 the age-and-service pension bill was passed for Civil War soldiers, but it was not until 1918, 53 years after the Civil War, that the veterans of the Civil War were granted a further increase, and this ranged from $30 to $40 per month; but, of course, this did not affect disability incurred in the service in the line of duty. On January 5, 1920, we passed what is known as the Fuller bill, giving to Union soldiers from $50 to $95 per month, according to age and disability. This bill has gone to the Senate and we are assured it will become a law.

My bill provided for a higher maximum for Spanish-American and Philippine soldiers. Capt. Chisholm, Capt. Lewis, and Sergt. Lamb, all representing the national legislative committee of the United Spanish War Veterans, appeared before our committee and indorsed this bill as reported by our committee, and all of these, in order to secure the early passage of this bill, agreed that we should fix the rates from $12 to $30 per month and we could depend upon Congress to grant increases such as time might justify. This bill, like the Civil War veteran law of 1890, does not require the soldier or sailor to have contracted his disabilities in the service or in line of duty.

WHO WILL BE BENEFITED?

It may be asked under what state of case, if this bill should become a law, could a Spanish-American or Philippine War soldier or sailor or a Boxer rebellion soldier secure a pension? We must bear in mind that under this bill the disability need not to have been contracted in the service or in line of duty, and there need be no disability at all after the soldier or sailor reaches the age of 62 years. If the soldier or sailor served as much as 90 days and received an honorable discharge in either of these wars and is now totally or so much disabled either physically or mentally as to hinder him from earning support and this disability is not caused by his own vicious habit, he is entitled to a pension. For instance, I know a great many soldiers and sailors of these wars who came out of the Army in good health, but since that time they have accidently or otherwise lost an eye, both eyes, a hand, a foot, a leg, have had their backs broken, have become ruptured, have contracted tuberculosis, kidney trouble, heart disease, have become insane, or have other disabilities which were not the result of their own vicious habits. The capacity of all of these to perform manual labor has been greatly impaired, some totally and others partially. Under this bill, upon proof of these facts, these soldiers and sailors will receive from $12 to $30 per month, according to their disability. This bill takes care of that class of soldiers and sailors who have served their country nobly in her hour of stress and peril and now because of accident or of disease are totally or partially incapacitated to perform manual labor and earn a support for themselves and families.

This bill was reported without a dissenting vote, and I hope that not a vote will be cast against it in the House. These soldiers and sailors came from all parts of the country.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY HAS ALWAYS CHAMPIONED THE CAUSE OF THE AMERICAN SOLDIER AND SAILOR.

It was the Republican Party that made the fight for a pension for Civil War soldiers and it is a Republican Congress now that proposes this general law for the Spanish-American and Philippine war soldiers and sailors.

The question has been asked, What has the Republican Congress done and what will it do for the World War veterans? A Democratic Congress provided compensation for the World War veterans at from $3 to $30 per month. Only $30 per month if a man had lost both arms, both legs, and both eyes unless he paid for and carried insurance. This Republican Congress has increased this to $80 and $100 per month, according to the disability. Our Committee on Education reported out and passed a bill for vocational training and rehabilitation of disabled veterans, allowing them $80 and $100 per month while taking this training. Our committee is reporting out an amendment allowing single men $100 per month and a married man $120 per month and allowance for his dependent while taking this training. This Republican Congress has already appropriated about $200,000,000 to take care of our disabled veterans of the World War.

I have introduced a bill for additional pay for these veterans—$30 per month for those who served in this country and $40 per month for those who served overseas for each month of service, and this in addition to what they are already receiving. A great many other bills have been introduced, with the exception of one for a lesser amount.

In May, 1917, when the pay of the American soldier was fixed by a Democratic Congress, the Republicans urged more pay for these soldiers and sailors, but the Democrats had control of Congress and ignored this demand. I believed then and I have believed ever since that their pay was inadequate. Many young men were taken out of the office, the store, and the school and put in the Army at $30 per month, while thousands of others were given civil offices under the Government at from $1,000 to $5,000 per year. Many of the best mechanics of the country were taken and put in the Army at $30 per month, while thousands of no better mechanics were employed by the Government at from six to fifteen dollars per day. The civil employees of the Government were voted a bonus by a Democratic Congress of $240 per year, but this same Democratic Congress, when the American soldier was discharged, voted a bonus of only $60. I contend that these World War veterans are entitled to additional compensation and shall do all I can to help them to secure same. The Democratic Secretary of the Treasury said he would throw up his hands and quit if this additional pay was granted. Billions were wasted by this same administration, and if only one-half had been saved that was wasted there would be ample funds on hand to pay this additional sum. The Republican Party has always championed the cause of the American soldier and sailor, and this additional pay would have been granted but for the fact that the present administration has wasted the money of the people, and the Government has not the money now to pay this additional sum; but I am sure that this Republican Congress will grant this additional pay if it has to issue bonds to the soldiers for same. I feel it my duty to do all in my power to accomplish this end. It has been well said a country that will not protect its protectors and defend its defenders should not be protected and defended. Every time the American soldiers and sailors have been called upon to go forth to fight and defend this country they have always brought back the Stars and Stripes with honor and victory.

H. R. 2, a Bill to Pension Soldiers of War with Spain, Philippine Insurrection, and China Relief Expedition.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KING SWOPE,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 25, 1920.

Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the soldiers of the Revolutionary War carved the star of American independence from the heart of British tyranny. The soldiers of the War of 1812 protected out independence from British aggression and maintained our rights on the high seas. The Union soldiers of the Civil War preserved the Union and liberty of Washington and retained every star in our national firmament. And the soldiers and sailors of the Spanish-American War by their achievements on land and sea made the United States one of the great world powers. Not until that war did Europe fully realize the great military possibilities of the United States. Consequently, the beginning of our prominence as a world power dates back to our victory over Spain. The heroes of that war, in response to the call by President McKinley for men, volunteered in greater numbers than the Government was able to equip and train. They came from North, South, East, and West, forgot all sectional differences, and blended into one great American Army to carry the blessing of American liberty and protection to an enslaved and mistreated people. By appropriate legislation in the past we have, for the greater part, taken care of most all of the disabled or dependent veterans except those of the Spanish-American War. I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is high time we were making more elaborate plans to take care of the veterans of the Spanish-American War, because by taking care of the Nation's defenders we will best show our appreciation for their services and by so doing will proclaim that he who dares to risk his life or health for his country may do so in the full knowledge and confidence that his country will not let him come to want or suffering, which will cause all future generations of Americans to gladly follow the colors in time of national stress.

To-day there are approximately 370,000 living veterans of the Spanish-American War. Of that number about 10,000, according to Capt. Daniel V. Chisholm, of the national legislative committee of the United Spanish War Veterans, are entitled to pensions and would doubtless apply for same. Under present conditions they could only apply under the general pension laws or come in under special acts. In order to come in under the general pension laws, the applicant must furnish the positive proof that his disability is of service origin. He must prove absolutely that the disability was in line of duty, and offer this proof by way of affidavits of company officers, and that is impossible at this late date. Often, I am told, there were detachments without surgeons, and, of course, in such cases medical testimony could not be obtained. The Sells bill, H. R. 2, relieves this difficult situation and gives a pensionable status to all persons who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now or who may hereafter be suffering from any mental or physical disability or disabilities of a permanent character not the result of their own vicious habits, and which so incapacitates them from the performance of manual labor as to render them unable to earn a support. The minimum amount is $12 per month and the maximum is $30 per month. In addition to the disability feature of the bill, there is, as amended by the committee, a provision which automatically pensions these veterans on a graduated scale according to their age. For instance, upon reaching the age of 62, regardless of disability, one of these Spanish War veterans would automatically receive a pension of $12 per month; at the age of 68, $18 per month; 72 years of age, $24 per month; at 75 years of age he would receive the maximum, which is $30. These amounts, while small, would be a great help to some of these veterans and would be money charitably spent by a grateful country to its loyal defenders. I am in favor of the passage of this bill, and hope that the day may never come upon this earth when one soldier who served his country loyally and faithfully shall come to want or suffering.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARVIN JONES,

OF TEXAS.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the issue before the House is not whether the railroads will be returned to their owners; that has been settled, and they will be returned. It is very manifest that the people desire the restoration to private management, and that this demand is well-nigh universal. The President has already, by proclamation, decreed that the railroads should be returned on March 1, 1920, at 12 o'clock high noon. As stated by Chairman ESCH, who reported this bill, this removes any doubt as to their return, and on that date the railways of this country will again become privately managed. The only issue to be settled by the House is what legislation shall be passed governing their future management.

The bill as reported by the conference committee is a monstrosity, and among other reasons I might assign for opposing it I mention the following:

First. It pledges the United States Treasury for the payment of guaranteed dividends and provides for fixed earnings. Such a guaranty will encourage waste and inefficiency. The farmer, ranchman, or other business man is not guaranteed any return, nor should the roads be. I am opposed to class legislation whether it be in the name of capital or in the name of labor. This bill provides for the few hundred railroad owners a guaranteed value of $18,000,000,000. It is therefore class legislation and is indefensible. This issue is absolutely a fundamental one, and it is a false policy to guarantee that a man is going to make a profit on his investment. What inducement will he have in the first place to efficient management and what salvation is there for the people who pay the bills?

Second. It provides that not a foot of railway can be built without getting permission of the Washington authorities. It makes no difference that a group of citizens living in my section may desire to build a short-line railway to connect a rich scope of country with an existing line, and those citizens may have the money with which to build and operate the road, yet they can not lay a crosstie nor drive a spike without the permission of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which will require a delegation to come to Washington; and when they arrive they may find some eastern or northern concern is able to make a better showing or is opposed to any further extension in our section, and they may deny the right of our people thus to develop their country. On what theory do you justify a provision that a citizen or a combination of citizens must secure the consent of Washington authorities before they can spend their own money?

Third. It gives the Interstate Commerce Commission permanent authority to order every car out of Texas to Pennsylvania or New York, and thus let our crops rot. My section has had its experience with the Washington control of cars. This, to my mind, is the most objectionable provision of the whole bill. To get at the practical side of the question, let us suppose that the 53 counties that I have the honor to represent need 530 cars, or an average of 10 cars per county, to relieve an existing emergency. At the same time the steel mills of Pennsylvania need 530 cars to relieve an emergency existing in that section. The Interstate Commerce Commission has at its disposal just 500 cars to meet these situations. The chambers of commerce at Pittsburgh and other points get busy and flood the Interstate Commerce Commission with telegrams describing the urgent need of cars. They send a large delegation down to Washington, which is just a two hours' ride. No county of northwest Texas can afford to send such a delegation, although the need of cars may be just as great. I ask you in all candor and fairness where do you think those 500 cars will go? I would be insulting your intelligence were I to suggest an answer.

As a matter of fact arbitrary regulation or restriction almost always hampers any kind of activity, and the free law of supply and demand is a far more satisfactory method of handling a matter of this kind.

Fourth. It abolishes State commissions and authorizes an unlimited increase in rates.

Fifth. This bill practically nullifies all of the Texas railroad laws now on the statute books and those of every other State in the Union.

Sixth. In all of the discussion of this bill the interest of the people has been practically lost in the mêlée. As a matter of fact, the interests of the people are and should be paramount, and the question of service to the people and the rights of the people generally should be the predominant and decisive consideration. According to the very terms of this conference report, there will be an immediate expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars of the people's money, and instead of a return of the railroads to their owners, anyone who will read the bill carefully will see that a permanent Federal control is provided more far-reaching than any that has been heretofore conceived.

These reckless and tremendous appropriations and Government expenditures must stop. Appropriations must be cut to the limit all along the line, and economy must be the watchword of the hour. I have voted against many of the appropriations of the last few months and expect to do so in the future, and in practically every instance I have voted to reduce the necessary appropriations. We must get back to the policy of rigid economy, both in public and in private life.

I am not in favor of a niggardly policy with reference to the railways of this country. I am in favor of such rates as will not only permit successful operation and management, but such as will also encourage new construction. No finer laws, however, were ever devised than those which existed prior to taking over of Federal control, provided adequate rates are allowed. The laws actually permit private management and free development, but the provisions of the pending bill absolutely hamstring the railways and tie them by the provisions of a national law which will require both the railroads and the people to ask a board in Washington every time they have anything to do in connection with railway transportation.

In other words, the conference report would perpetuate Federal control under the guise of a return to the owners. Where does the public come in on such a proposition? Under the President's proclamation the roads will be returned March 1, and they can operate under the laws existing prior to the time they were taken over, and under which we had the finest railways and railway service in the world, and I am anxious for this return.

Conference Report on the Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. BLACKMON,
OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, I was compelled to go home some days before the vote was reached on the railroad bill, on account of my own illness.

On February 17 I sent the following telegram to one of my colleagues:

ANNISTON, ALA., February 17, 1920.

S. H. DENT, Jr.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Please pair me against conference report on Cummings-Esch bill. If no record vote, read this message into the RECORD.

FRED L. BLACKMON.

I am informed by my colleague that on account of an unusually large number of Members present on the occasion of this vote, he was unable to obtain a pair, so that the RECORD would show that had I been present I would have voted against the conference report.

I therefore take occasion, under leave to extend remarks, granted while this conference report was under discussion, to state my position in the RECORD.

The conference report as finally drafted contains many objectionable features, and on account of these objectionable features, had I been present my vote would have been cast in the negative.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. BABKA,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. BABKA. Mr. Speaker, the statement that if this conference report should be defeated the transportation system would be thrust into a state of chaos is untrue and, in my opinion, a deliberate attempt to cover up the several bad features of the bill. In the event this conference report is defeated there will still remain ample time for the conferees to take the bill, eliminate the objectionable features, bring it back to the House, and secure its passage. This should be done because in its present form the bill is one of the most dangerous pieces of legislation ever presented to the Congress. It is a glaring departure from all American principles, in that it establishes the dangerous precedent of guaranteeing the income of a private corporation. Section 422 of the bill provides for the fixing of such rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission as will yield a return of 5½ per cent on the valuation of the railroads for a period of two years after March 1, 1920.

Mr. Speaker, how can we justify this position in the eyes of the American public? Under what theory of our Government can we justify this partiality shown to the holders of railroad stocks and securities? If it is right to guarantee the income of the holders of these stocks and securities, why not guarantee the income of all private corporations, of whatever nature or description? Would it not be just as right and equitable? And, Mr. Speaker, if our Government is to embark upon this new field, why not start where it is needed most? Why not guarantee the wages of the toilers, the men whose labors make it possible to earn the income? Why favor those who already have more than they need and overlook those who barely eke out an existence for themselves and their families?

Mr. Speaker, the argument made for this provision, that it is necessary in order to keep the railroads from going into the hands of the receivers, is all rot. The railroads are in better condition now than when they were taken over by the Government. During the period of Government control more money has been spent on betterments and improvements than during any corresponding period of their existence. And the bill allows the railroads 10 years' time to pay for these additions and betterments. Therefore their property is in better shape now than it was for a long time, and if they are operated wisely and economically there can be no possible danger of their failure.

Mr. Speaker, when the railroads were taken over the employees were free and unfettered, and, in my opinion, should be left so. The railroads and the employees were always able to settle their difficulties before. I understand that of more than 25,000 disputes only 3 were not settled by the board set up by the operators and the employees. Can we hope to ever approach this fine showing under the board set up by this bill?

Mr. Speaker, because of these objections and others, of which I shall not take the time to speak, I am opposed to this bill in its present form and shall vote against the conference report.

Abraham Lincoln.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 26, 1920.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following address before the Mifflin County Roosevelt Republican Club, of Lewistown, Pa., February 12, 1920:

"Mr. Toastmaster, members of the Roosevelt Republican Club, and other friends, it was George Bancroft who in his matchless eulogy on Lincoln before the two Houses of Congress in 1866 said that 'Eternal wisdom marshals the great procession of nations,' and that 'God rules amidst the wreck and ruin of history.'

"It was Lincoln who accorded Washington more than human powers, surely a man divinely chosen, for of him, in an address in 1842, he said:

"'Washington is the mightiest name on earth—long since mightiest in the cause of civil liberty; still mightiest in moral reformation. On that name no eulogy is expected. It can not be. To add brightness to the sun or glory to the name of Washington is alike impossible. Let none attempt it. In solemn awe pronounce the name, and in its naked, deathless splendor leave it shining on.'

"And of both Washington and Lincoln Franklin B. Wiley, in a recent able article, says:

"'The time has long been here when in solemn awe and reverence we pronounce the name of Lincoln with that of Washington, and in their naked, deathless splendor leave them both shining on.'

"Therefore, singly or collectively, we can be but an atom of the divine scheme but yet a part; and so far as human vision extends it reveals the Republican Party an outstanding agency, that so far as we can judge has been the perfection of human wisdom in accomplishing all that has been stable and enduring in free government.

"Since the Republican Party has been the instrumentality which has standardized this Government as a world's model, the hypothesis of which is justice and equality, the Roosevelt Republican Club has planted its standard upon a sure foundation, and I join with you to-night in the certain assurance that this organization is going to bind in fellowship, in fraternity, and in exalted purpose until its zone of usefulness is wide-flung and the fruits of constancy and devoted adherence are everywhere manifest.

"Just as 'the soul grows in the direction of its attention,' so your interest in this club will enlarge and unify the Republican Party as never before.

"We are stepping upon the threshold of a new era, if we are not in the midst of one, and while all is not now normal under Republican guidance the achievements of the future promise to eclipse the wonders of the past.

"And in the name you have chosen for your organization there is inspiration, if not magic. Typical of all that is aggressive and progressive and all that is virile and understandable that was ever reflected in any other great American, Theodore Roosevelt was therefore a man altogether fit to follow in the footsteps of the immortal Lincoln.

"The tragic years of war burned into the soul of America a renewed realization of the fact that this Nation leads the world in hope for the human race, while recent experiences with the administration of public affairs give cause for rejoicing that the change in the Nation's guidance will this year be completed and the true destiny of the country accomplished under the dominance of sturdy, progressive, constructive, and triumphant Republicanism.

"No one in the Republican Party ever made the declaration that we are too proud to fight, that we should think in terms only of neutrality, nor has any Republican ever won an election on the counterfeit slogan, 'He kept us out of war.' Neither is any Republican un-American enough to accept without ample reservations the league of peace terms, that would tear down and surrender what cost hundreds of thousands of lives and countless treasure to make safe against all the world of royalty, nobility, autocracy, and tyranny—our sovereignty and independence.

"The Republican Party rests upon standardized principles, and is a party that reflects the popular will and that has the courage to wait for the free flow of that will into a crystallization of common purpose, and thus, supported by the infallible final judgment of the masses, strikes hard for the things of human interest and concern.

"And nowhere in all this great land could there be found a more fitting place than Lewistown for the launching of a Roosevelt club, nor from any other body of men anywhere would more be expected by way of honest-to-goodness Republicanism, the kind that neither swerves nor dodges in time of test and trial, but which keeps to the main line, than in this community. Nowhere else in America can there be found a record surpassing the patriotic devotion and self-sacrifice and exalted manhood and womanhood in the years that have flown in the making of the Republic, hence a high degree of accomplishment must be recorded to match the dauntless deeds of the fathers.

"But the sons and grandsons are vindicating the faith of the fathers, for deeds beyond the commonplace in heroic achievement are to the credit of the men of this town and Mifflin County. On the battle fields of revolutionary strife, in resisting British aggression in 1812, and in hurling back the tide of treason from 1861 to 1865 as well as in 1898, when the red and yellow ensign of Spain was shot away—in fact, on all battle fields, including those of Europe in the late war—there is reflected glory, and standing forever immortal with the rest are the dauntless 'Logan Guards.'

"While we have not come together to do as Hannibal, when he had his son swear eternal vengeance against Rome, we are here, I hope, to resolve that the energies of the Republican Party are to be renewed and quickened and that one and all will pledge devotion to the party Lincoln created and honored and which McKinley and Roosevelt glorified. Let no small divisions and asperities be countenanced, but let every deed of loyalty be rewarded and applauded.

"When we regard the magnitude of the country we can not help but contemplate in all seriousness what is involved in directing the energies of such a gigantic Christian and civilized development intrusted into the hands of the people whose will makes the law and who constitute the State and make it sovereign. It is almost bewildering and engulfs the imagination to realize that our domestic commerce is twenty times the aggregate international trade of all creation; that we manufacture even in normal times more finished products than all the shops and all the factories of Great Britain, Germany, and France combined, plus five billions, while we pay as much in wages as the rest of the entire world. To this sum total of achievements we must add the increased wealth of this Nation, which was $350,000,000,000 in 1910 and is now $500,000,000,000, with 300,000,000 of acres of public domain in reserve and our resources capable of sustaining a population of 3,000,000,000.

"Such is the sweep and scope and magnitude of this Nation, and to guide it aright and maintain our laws and yet do the just and righteous thing by every citizen, be that citizen man or woman, well may we to-night turn back and summon the shade of Lincoln in counsel.

"We are now only beginning to emerge from a labyrinth of tangled confusion due to the most stupendous bungling of affairs ever known anywhere, of waste and extravagance, and millions consumed and thrown to the winds by the plus 10 per cent men, and as a consequence of the vanity of those high in the counsels of the Democratic Party. To consume 10 acres of piled lumber at one cantonment to make room that the crowd might hear the Secretary of War speak, beats Nero's fiddling while Rome burned, and is enough to consign the present administration to eternal political exile. To bury tons of nails that profiteering contractors might get more of the plus 10 per cent is sufficient to note the trend and tendency of what was going on at home while our brave boys were 3,000 miles away fighting for the world's liberty and doing their best to get along on a paltry $30 per month.

"But back of all this dark cloud is the silver lining of hope and assurance that the great party of progress and power, of capacity and patriotism, of business instincts and economy, is about to supplant for all time on present alignments the tried and found wanting Democratic organization which lives only because of the fraudulent vote in the solid South, and it is plain to see never succeeded and never can succeed unless Republicans become too much assured and permit their ranks to be broken by a breach from within. At no time since secession hung its harp on the willow tree at Appomattox were there ever more Democrats in America than Republicans, but that majority must be united.

"Around the whole of Lincoln's life was spun the great central idea of human equality, and that has since been the central idea of the Republican Party, expanded and glorified into a fair chance in the race of life.

"When we talk about the fundamental principles of the Republican Party we are speaking in terms that mean the American standard of wages and living and the American standard of opportunity as against the fundamental policy of the Democratic Party, which deals only in the cost to the consumer no matter whether the American producer must compete with the cheap labor of China and Japan with accompanying animal-like conditions of living. The Republican conception of the ideals of Lincoln, McKinley, and Roosevelt is to shorten the distance between the alley of misery and want and human wretchedness and the palace on the boulevard where excesses and overabundance obtain.

"The constructive policies of the Republican Party as heretofore and now laid down are for the comfort of every man's home, for education, home owning, and those things that make every American feel proud of his citizenship instead of despising himself as men must do in many countries because they are not citizens, but subjects.

"At the beginning of the present Democratic administration we heard the encouraging announcement from the President that for American workmen to meet foreign competition they should 'whet their wits and speed up.' More literally the translation means, Go to it and beat the foreigner by doing more work. For me I can only say God spare the American workman such a fate; indeed, he will be spared such a fate with Republican policies functioning.

"The Lincoln keynote was the tariff, and it is our keynote to-day, and will continue to be until the standard of living throughout the world is raised to that of our own. In peace times this question transcends all others, for there is no method by which we can buy our necessities abroad and yet produce them at home; and the only way we can compete with European and Asiatic subjects is to starve back into the factory the American citizen. The Republican Party never was and never will be for any such economic policy; nor for tariff for revenue only or anything short of absolute protection of our own industries and our workmen, that we may never be at the mercy of foreign profiteers. A fine slogan for the present would be as Lincoln put it, 'America should buy from Americans.'

"We have most humanely and lavishly divided our opportunities and resources with the incoming hordes of foreigners, and, surpassing all the deeds of charity and compassion and chivalry, we sent our armies like driving, devastating thunderbolts against the iron lines of trained soldiers who vaunted forth to envelop the world with Prussian autocracy and militarism. With benevolent bestowal we have succored the deluged nations of the world, rescued them from their own blind folly by the unparalleled heroism of our own citizen soldiers, and then admonished them to enthrone liberty and never again trust to monarchy and nobility.

"How we grieve for those boys lost at the front; how our sympathies go out to the fathers and mothers at home sitting by the vacant chairs, while our hearts bleed for the maimed we see everywhere in our land.

"Never since the sacrifice of the Cross has so much that was precious been given for any cause.

"But to save men from further serfdom, to hold aloft forever the beacon light of liberty, we can not—the Republican Party will not—permit the destruction of the American home by giving all we have through a league and thereby inviting the extinction of man's fondest hope, his most cherished emotion—human liberty.

"Since I last addressed a Lewistown audience vast and overshadowing things have occurred in this land and throughout the world. Here the wounds are yet too fresh for me to recount much of heroism and attending sorrow having their relationship with this town and community, which came under my observation in my official relationship during the trying hours of the war and since.

"Many have gone; many whose deeds are immortal fell lifeless in defense of their country and human rights and whose spirits are now among the stars. Nothing can dim the luster of their fame, and throughout all time the choicest words will be used in recalling their grateful service.

"But this occasion is one set apart for all Americans to pay tribute to the mind and heart of a man so extraordinary that one great writer was impelled to say of him, 'He was without ancestors, without fellows, and can have no successor.'

"Lincoln birthday anniversaries will constantly attract more interest since he was the embodiment of the then and now dominant conception of American opportunity and actual realization. He must regarded the most typical American so long as the poor boy may feel in his little heart that there is nothing spurious or counterfeit about the possibility of one who is born in a log cabin becoming President and occupying the White House.

"History and tradition have been explored in vain to find a parallel to Lincoln's character. Great men have differed as to the wisdom of his policy regarding slavery and States' rights, but they did not deny the sincerity of Lincoln; while in time all who had reviled him were eager to offer praise for the sad life he led on account of the period of trial and traged, through which he passed.

"We heard an eminent theologian and pulpit orator express the measure used to estimate the worth of good men's lives. He said, 'Some one has said that a saint is a good man dead 100 years, cannonaded then but canonized now.' It is declared in Holy Writ that the prophet is not without honor save in his own country. That is true of all prophets. Stones have been their bed and bread. Lincoln was no exception to the rule. In his day he was slandered and maligned, denounced and martyred.

"'Yesterday we called Washington a fastidious aristocrat, Lincoln an ape and buffoon, and McKinley a designing imperialist. To-day we set these men on Olympus with the gods and speak of them as patriots and prophets. For living prophets we have epithets; for dead ones, epitaphs.'

"Mr. Lincoln's place is, has long been, and ever will be among the world's heroes. And among these heroes he is unique. He touched the extremes. He rose from obscurity to the highest place. Self-taught, he became a master of expression, producing addresses and State papers which Carl Schurz, an accomplished critic, thought worthy to stand for beauty and power beside the deliverances of the Hebrew prophets. He was the most bitterly abused and the most lovingly praised man of his time. He entered the White House an object of ridicule and distrust, and left it in his coffin lamented even by his adversaries. It is little to say that we have produced no man like him. The world has not.

"The test of this man's greatness is that extravagance has not fazed it. He first encountered the extravagance of abuse. Some of the sharpest tongues and the sharpest pens of his generation at home and abroad exercised themselves on him. Ridiculing the Rail-splitter became a fad; and the fad spread. London and Paris, in a less malicious way, took a hand. All in vain. Exalted character and purpose survived all the assaults.

"Then followed the extravaganee of praise. Former enemies, rebuked by death, sought to expiate their offenses by stilted eulogy. Lifelong friends and supporters, finding their appraisements approved by time and act, spoke in higher notes than ever of their leader's wonderful gifts and performances. They overdressed with high language and comparison the fine form of a perfect simplicity.

"But the real Lincoln can be traced through it all. He lived in his own words and deeds. They interpret themselves. He arose above all his detractors, and rises now above the most eloquent of his eulogists. The best study of the man is in himself and what he wrought for the country during his 4 years and 30 days in the White House. In fact, they are the only safe sources, for if one relies upon the commentators—popular orators, students of history, closet essayists, or philosophers—he is certain to miss the cream of the story's inspiration and instruction.

"A great eulogist said: Lincoln cared not so much whether men were great or small, what he wanted to know was whether they were right or wrong. He it was who said that this is a Government for the plain people and that the plain people are the only kind of people it is worth while having a country like this for.

"He had no opportunity for education excepting by his own application, but he learned deeper things than books can teach, and these things were acquired in the great school of nature, which is always in session, and whose students never graduate.

"The lessons he had learned in the university of nature brought him close to the heart of humanity. Truly it is a lesson for the skeptics and modern philosophers to be confronted with the life of this man, who knowing only mostly nature's curriculum, his Gettysburg speech is admittedly the greatest deliverance of all time by men anywhere next to the Sermon on the Mount.

"Enoch saw and walked with God; we to-night walk with the spirits of Lincoln, McKinley, and Roosevelt; and let me say that had this club's patron, Theodore Roosevelt, been in a position to tell the Kaiser just once where to get off, there would have been no doubt left right there as to whether or not Americans are 'too proud to fight.'

"In conclusion let us be assured that while we have much to meet and surmount before the country resumes normal functioning processes, there are no dangers we can not overcome, be the duty to hang reds who would destroy our Government and set up anarchy which is liberty's tomb, or any species of revolution that would violently and against the will of the people set aside our sacred Constitution and supplant it with another.

"The Republican Party with such memories, with such work charted for the future, will never sound a retreat. It was wombed when tempests beat about the rock of our Constitution; when treason rolled against the steps of our Capitol, and throughout all time posterity will acclaim its exalted accomplishments for humanity.

"With Lincoln its first successful standard bearer, and in the shining light of the achievements of Grant, and McKinley, and Roosevelt, the Republican Party will live on to extend freedom and equality and bring happiness and prosperity to every man's home and fireside."

Conference Report on the Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. BOX,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, this bill unnecessarily and gravely wrongs our people at home and everywhere by freeing the owners of railway systems of the restraints imposed by wise laws suggested by the experience of the people as necessary for their protection and enacted and improved by them during a period of 40 years. It lays heavy and unjust burdens on the public for the financial advantage of the owners of railway investments. It destroys the laws of Texas and other States, just and valid in themselves, and continually upheld by the tribunals of the people, including the great Supreme Court of the Nation. By congressional enactment and without consulting the States it destroys the constitutions of States, including specific parts of that of Texas, to which I owe allegiance as a lawyer, as a citizen, and, above all, as a Representative of Texas people.

My legislative experience is brief, but as a citizen and as a lawyer I have noted some lawmaking. I register it as my judgment that this is the most wicked piece of legislation I ever observed. This House could force out of this measure the iniquities it contains and pass a just measure returning the roads to the companies, if it would. Do not tell me that the House must take this or nothing. I know better.

I do not predict the result of this legislation upon the political fortunes of men or parties. That is trivial compared with the course of the Nation or the welfare of its people. But if I believed in socialism or sovietism I would welcome this as inviting them. You can not outrage the people without weakening the bonds of government. Greed, when given the opportunity it has had in this situation, always overreaches itself. By law of human life I am taught that this wrong will react against railroad and related financial interests, but millions of the innocent will share in the hardships it will entail.

The Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM C. LANKFORD,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 23, 1920,

On the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, it is hard to act when duty calls you in two directions at the same time and you can only go one way. Especially is this hard when the performance of one duty has the appearance of a refusal to perform another duty practically as sacred.

This is the position in which many Members of Congress found themselves last Saturday when they came to vote on the conference report on the railroad legislation. The bill has 120 pages of printed matter and contains many most excellent provisions, but many dangerous provisions.

I favor with my whole being many of the provisions of the bill, but there are so many objectionable features in it that I could not conscientiously vote for the bill.

I like sugar, but if arsenic or strychnine is mixed with it I do not want the sugar. The most dangerous legislation passed here is that bad legislation which is put in with good legislation. The vicious measures ofttimes are sugar coated, and if we do not watch we swallow something mighty poisonous because the outside is sweet.

What is the sugar of the present bill? Well, to me the good part of the present bill is its most excellent provisions for the short lines of railroads. The short lines of railroads mean so much to my section of the State that I felt like I could not afford to vote against anything in their behalf. I found myself studying hour after hour over the bill and trying to whip myself into line to vote for the bill on account of the short lines of railroads and because many of my friends asked me to do all I could for the short lines. I begged the conferees to put in the provisions in favor of the short lines which are in the bill, and now they are in the bill; and at last I was forced to vote against the bill because of the poisonous, vicious provisions of the report.

I am so sorry that really great constructive legislation is oftimes loaded down with bad provisions. There are several reasons why I wanted to vote for this bill, but the chief reason is the one just mentioned.

Mr. Speaker, I have mentioned the sugar outside of the bill, now let us see some of the vicious poison inside of the bill. One serious objection to the bill is that it practically does away with the State railroad commission and puts great power in the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is another blow at State rights. It practically takes away from my State the right to control the railroads. I repeat what I said some time ago, we are blotting out State lines and the time is fast coming when there will be no need for State legislatures. All laws will be made here in Washington.

Mr. Speaker, I could not vote for the conference report because it does away with at least two provisions of the constitution of my State and strikes at others. The first provision is paragraph 1, section 2, of article 4, of the constitution of Georgia, and is in the following language:

Railroad tariffs: The power and authority of regulating railroad freights and passenger tariffs, preventing unjust discriminations, and requiring reasonable and just rates of freight and passenger tariffs are hereby conferred upon the general assembly, whose duty it shall be to pass laws, from time to time, to regulate freight and passenger tariffs, to prohibit unjust discriminations on the various railroads of this State, and to prohibit said roads from charging other than just and reasonable rates, and enforce the same by adequate penalties.

This conference report does away with this part of my State constitution as though it was "only a scrap of paper" by giving the Interstate Commerce Commission jurisdiction of the matters of serious import mentioned in this part of the constitution. But let us look at paragraph 4, section 2, of article 4, of the constitution of the State of Georgia, which is as follows:

Paragraph 4. Buying stock, etc., in other corporations; competition: The general assembly of this State shall have no power to authorize any corporation to buy shares or stock in any other corporation in this State or elsewhere, or to make any contract or agreement whatever, with any such corporation, which may have the effect, or be intended to have the effect, to defeat or lessen competition in their respective businesses, or to encourage monopoly; and all such contracts and agreements shall be illegal and void.

The present railroad bill allows the very things which that part of our Constitution would prevent. Let us see what the present railroad bill provides:

In section 407, subdivision 2, it is provided that the Interstate Commerce Commission may permit the acquisition by one carrier "of the control of any other such carrier or carriers, either under a lease or by purchase of stock." The Georgia constitution and statutes absolutely prohibit the acquisition by one railroad corporation of any competing or parallel line within the State under any circumstances. This national authority gives the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to allow, for instance, the Southern Railway to acquire and control every foot of railroad in Georgia, and thereby monopolize the whole business and destroy every vestige of competition, and writes off the book Georgia's constitutional and statutory provisions on that subject.

In paragraph 6, of section 407, it is provided that, after a hearing before the commission in which the railroads concerned and the governor of the State shall have a hearing, the Interstate Commerce Commission can authorize any two railroads to consolidate, "and thereupon such consolidation may be effected in accordance with such order, if all the carriers involved assent thereto, the law of any State or the decision of any State authority to the contrary notwithstanding." The constitution and statutes of Georgia have forbidden the consolidation of competing or parallel lines of railroads in Georgia. This authority in the present bill absolutely and expressly overrides that power, and allows them to consolidate openly, boldly, and defiantly in the face of the organic law of my State, and I decline to vote to repudiate that fundamental law which is written in wisdom for the protection of the public of Georgia.

Mr. Speaker, I can not and will not assume the responsibility of voting here to do away with the constitution of my State, either in whole or in part.

If the constitution of my State is to be changed, let it be done orderly and legally by the General Assembly of Georgia and by the voters of my State, not by Congress usurping the rights of my State.

Where are we to drift? Shall Congress overnight blot out State rights, do away with sacred State constitutional rights, and take unto the Federal Government every vestige of the rights of the people of the States to govern themselves? God forbid.

Mr. Speaker, there are many very serious objections to this report and time will not allow me to attempt to discuss them all. I will, though, mention one more, to me, very serious objection, which of itself would prevent my supporting this measure.

I refer to the provision which authorizes the fixing of freight and passenger rates sufficiently high to enable the railroads to make a 5½ per cent net operating income. This does not sound real bad at first, does it? Well, let us consider it just a minute. The estimate is that in order to provide for this guaranty it is necessary to raise freight and passenger rates sufficiently high to put in the pockets of the railroads the additional sum of $1,214,000,000 per year. This amount is so large that it staggers the human mind, so let us get it into simpler figures. It means an average extra cost of about $12 each year, or $1 a month, to every man, woman, and child in the United States. The estimate is that the Government is now losing about $318,000,000 per year, or nearly $1,000,000 a day. Hands are held up in holy horror at this loss. Let us get to simpler figures, so as to see again where we are. This means a loss of an average of about $3 per year, or 25 cents per month, to every man, woman, and child in the United States. Now we are getting at the milk in the coconut. The present Government control is costing on an average of 25 cents each month to every human being in our country. The present bill is to solve that difficulty by providing for a dollar a month loss to every man, woman, and child. We are going to save 25 cents by spending a dollar a month. A child can see the viciousness of the idea. I am like the old darky, "I ain't got much edication, but I got some sense," and it does not look good to me at all.

The Government is losing money by not increasing freight and passenger fares enough to make money during the present high-cost times. The Government could make money by charging more to the public. We are about to pass a bill to prevent the Government from losing 25 cents per month on each individual and let the railroads charge $1 more per month to each person.

The people have to pay the bill after all, and it does not differ which pocket the money comes out of; a dollar is a dollar. This bill proposes to save 25 cents in a man's right pocket by paying a dollar out of his left pocket. But the plot thickens; it looks now like the present bill will cost the common people four times as much as present Government control, but this is not all. You can not figure that a dollar increase in freight rates is only a dollar increase on the public, for every dollar increase in freight rates is passed on to the laboring man, the farmer, and consumer, not as a dollar in increase but after being multiplied by four.

Director of the Railroads Walker D. Hines says every dollar increase in freights means four dollars increase to the ultimate consumer. He says the present bill will increase the average cost of living more than $200 per year to every family in the United States. It is true there is great dissatisfaction at the present Government control of the roads. Are we to remedy present troubles by offering people something many times worse? If the loss is paid out of the Public Treasury, the larger part of it comes from big incomes and big inheritance taxes and a large amount would come out of the over a hundred thousand dollars per year salary of some of the railroad officials. Put the burden after multiplying it by about 16 on the great mass of common folks and it must be borne by the poorest of the poor, by crippled returned soldiers, widows and orphans of the Nation, and every man, woman, and child struggling for bread and meat.

But the argument is made that the roads are entitled to a fair return on their property. This is true; so are the farmers and all other legitimate lines of business entitled to a fair return on their labor and investment. They say railroads are very necessary to our welfare. So they are, but not more necessary than farmers and other businesses. Farmers are more necessary than all railroads. The world lasted thousands of years without railroads, but there have been farmers from the beginning of time.

It is said that 5½ per cent guaranty is fair to roads. I think it is more than fair. There is where I object. Let us look at the situation. Under this bill the railroads can give their presidents and officials salaries running up to over $10,000 per month each in some cases, as they have done in the past, and get freight rates sufficient to yield an average of 5½ per cent net income. Would not the banks like a rate of interest large enough to permit all the officials to get good salaries and yet get 5½ per cent net dividends?

Would not the farmers like a price on cotton and all farm products high enough for him to vote himself, boys, and girls nice salaries, to be agreed upon by them as high enough, and then after paying all expenses get 5½ per cent income on the full value of his farm and farm property, regardless of hog cholera, boll weevils, rainy weather, bad stands, or other misfortune? But the farmer can not expect all this. Then why give it to railroads? The trouble is the farmer can not get the guaranty. He has to be one of the fellows who does the guaranteeing and paying of the profit to the other fellow. Cotton went to bottom a few years ago. The farmers got no help. His hogs all die; no guaranty. Rain ruins his crop; no guaranty. Why make exceptions of railroads?

Now, we get the answer which settles the whole thing. They say the Government governs and controls the roads so much until the Government should give them legislation providing for an average of 5½ per cent per annum income. Oh, yes; I see. I wonder why I didn't think of that before. It is so easily explained. I find myself wondering again. I wonder if the Government does not control the poor farmer as much as the roads are controlled. It takes his boys, whether they say so or not, and puts them in the war, and they are left dead on the battle field. The Government takes his property for taxes and says whether he shall buy or sell sugar when he wants to. He is subject to the law the same as railroads. He is blood and flesh and bone; the railroads are properties of value but are not human. Why do more for railroads than for men, women, and children? I can not understand.

I was about to overlook a so-called reason for guaranteeing profits to railroads. It is urged that the roads were of great service during the war and should have 5½ per cent guaranty. So were the farmers, laborers, and their boys. So were about 23,000,000 men, women, and children who suffered in the body, took clothing off their backs, and food out of their mouths to buy Liberty bonds, thrift stamps, and war-saving stamps and won the war. The Government says these people, on the hard-earned cash which was put in these bonds and stamps, shall get 3 to 4 per cent income while the railroads are to get 5½ per cent, not on cash paid out but on estimated values, which will be much more than actual cash cost in many cases.

The lamentable fact is many a man, woman, and child will have to sell Liberty bonds or war-savings stamps at less than cost to help pay the guaranty to the railroads.

Mr. Speaker, I have urged two reasons why I was forced to vote against the present conference report. There are others. I can not discuss more of the bill just now. I am anxious for a great bill to be passed which will be fair to the railroads, the people, and the Nation.

Let us be fair to all. I would not favor a bill which is unfair to the roads. I can not and will not knowingly support a bill which I believe is unfair to the great mass of common people.

Not that I love the railroads less but that I love human beings more.

The Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD E. BROWNE.

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, I voted against the railroad bill when it was before us for consideration, and gave my reasons therefor. While this bill as it comes from the conference committee, in my opinion, is an improvement on the House bill, yet I can not support it for the following reasons:

WHAT RETURN OF RAILROADS MEANS AT THIS TIME.

Returning the railroads at this time means an increase of at least 25 per cent in freight rates. The railroad companies have stated this repeatedly, and this is verified by members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, whom I shall quote in the course of my remarks.

An increase in freight rates of 25 per cent that the carriers propose means that the shippers of the United States will pay $875,000,000 additional in freight.

High officials of the Government, like the Director General of Railroads, Walker D. Hines, and Robert W. Woolley, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, men who have given years of study to the railroad question and who are not biased by any prejudice, say that the increase of 25 per cent in freight rates, which private ownership at this time means, will be an increase to the ultimate consumer of $4,375,000,000, or $215 per family of five, assuming our population to be 100,000,000 people. You can realize what this stupendous amount means when you consider this is an amount in excess of all the assessed property of the wealthy State of Wisconsin, including all farms, personal property, and property of all kinds.

FARMERS ESPECIALLY HARD HIT.

An increase in freight rates is borne more by the farmer than any other producer. The reason is that the price of farm products is fixed in the markets of the world. The difference between the Chicago, St. Louis, and New York markets and the local markets where the farmers' products start on their journey to the consumer is the transportation charge that the farmer pays.

STARVING THE RAILROADS.

I have received many letters from the holders of railroad stocks and bonds and have seen much propaganda sent out by the railroads to the effect that the railroads have been starved by the Government. When in December, 1917, the Government took the railroads over as a war measure because they were not meeting the demands required by the Government private ownership and management of our transportation system had completely broken down.

Did the Government treat the railroads fairly? Yes; more than fairly. It paid them as rental an amount equal to the average amount of income they had received in the three prior years from June 30, 1914, to June 30, 1917, which were the most prosperous years the railroads had ever had in their history. What did the railroads receive under this management? According to Senator CUMMINS, who certainly would not be charged even by the railroads with hostility to the railroads, they received from two hundred and fifty to three hundred million dollars more per year than they should have received.

What were the dividends of some of these railroads? The Illinois Central Railroad received a net income of 11.33 per cent upon its capital stock; the Louisville & Nashville, 16.75 per cent; the Norfolk & Western, 12.51 per cent; the Atlantic Coast Line, 10.80 per cent; the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe, 9.70 per cent upon its capital stock; the Chicago & North Western, 10.18 per cent; the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, 22.05 per cent; the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie, 12.09 per cent.

These large dividends were paid upon the book value of the railroads, which all admit is an inflated valuation. These figures would not indicate that the railroads had been starved or had made any sacrifices during the war. On the contrary, it shows that the railroads have been among the heavy profiteers.

GOVERNMENTAL OWNERSHIP MISREPRESENTED.

The railroads from the beginning of governmental control have tried to discredit governmental management by an extensive and misleading propaganda. In stating the amount the Government has expended they do not tell you that the Government has been paying $940,000,000 annually to the railroad companies for the use of their property, $250,000,000 to $300,000,000 more each year than they should have paid. They do not tell you that under governmental control the Government increased the wages of all railroad employees to meet the high cost of living on the average of $31.67 per month per man. This increase of wages to date from January 1, 1918, amounted to over $874,000,000. The railroad companies would have been obliged to make this necessary increase in wages themselves under private control. They do not tell you that the Government expended $372,000,000 for cars and locomotives and that the Government paid out $780,405,512 for roadways, structures, and other betterments that were necessary to make the railroads efficient and were necessary because the railroads had been so greedy in paying themselves high dividends and their officers high salaries and had let the railroads run down.

SHOULD THE RAILROADS BE RETURNED AT THIS TIME.

Our foreign trade, our own economical well-being, depends upon a well mobilized and unified transportation system and a perfect coordination of rail and water transportation. In the past there has been ruinous competition and duplication among railroads. Water transportation on our great rivers has been throttled by the railroads owning the wharves and dockage and making unfair rates between certain competitive points. The railroads of the country have destroyed water transportation on which the Government has expended hundreds of millions of dollars.

RAILROAD DISCRIMINATION.

The Standard Oil Co., the Anthracite Trust, the Packers' Trust, the Steel Trusts, and all the great trusts in America were built up by discriminating freight rates. The directors of these great trusts and those of the railroads are interlocked. The Government has been powerless in the past to prevent discrimination in freight rates and special favors, and as a result all competition has been strangled, and these concerns, in their own language, charge all the traffic will stand and are responsible in a large measure for the high cost of living.

GUARANTEE THE RAILROADS PROFITS.

The bill provides that the Government shall guarantee every railroad in the United States a profit of from 5½ to 6 per cent on its property for two years. The value of the property will not be determined in that time, as the commissioners who are making a valuation state that they will not have completed their work before that time. Consequently the book valuation of the railroads, with all the watered stock, will be guaranteed a profit of from 5½ to 6 per cent. For example: The Baltimore & Ohio Chicago Terminal Railroad the last year before Government control operated 79 miles of railroad. It has a stock issue of $8,000,000. It has a bond issue amounting to $41,044,000, or $519,544 per mile. The owners of that stock are getting out of that terminal company in a way of net returns very little. In 1912–13 they had a deficit. In 1913–14 they had another deficit. Yet this railroad would be paid from 5½ to 6 per cent on its exorbitant capitalization under the guaranty of the Government. There are like examples. The principle of the Government guaranteeing profits to any person or corporation is indefensible and a dangerous precedent to establish.

OPERATING EXPENSES.

Under operating expenses the high officials can continue to receive their exorbitant salaries. I gave the names in my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 17, 1919, of over 200 officials that were receiving salaries ranging from $20,000 per year to over $100,000. J. M. Dickenson, receiver of the Rock Island, receives $120,000 per year under private management.

STUDY OF TRANSPORTATION.

I believe that before the railroads are returned a thorough study should be made of the transportation problems of both rail and water with the ultimate object of coordinating the two into one great system. That the basic principle observed should be service and building up our country and its many industries, small and large.

NOT AN AUSPICIOUS TIME TO RETURN RAILROADS.

The railroads themselves, in their demand for a guaranty by the Government, admit that they are not able to manage their roads without the Government standing back of them. The railroads themselves, in their demand for increased freight rates of 25 per cent, admit that this is not an auspicious time to return the roads. I herewith insert a letter written to me by Robert W. Woolley, a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, certainly a very high and disinterested authority. The commissioner in closing says:

> My belief is that attempting to reach a permanent solution of the railroad problem at a time when everything is in the flux is a hazardous proceeding fraught with danger to the Republic.

GOVERNMENT MANAGEMENT WORTH TRYING.

The railroads are now under Government management and operation. Many great savings and economies are being effected, as I pointed out in my remarks on the House bill in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 17, 1919. Consolidation of terminal stations, passenger and freight offices, shortening of freight routes—which alone resulted in a saving of over 58,315,800 car-miles—and a very great reduction of accidents by a well-organized committee of safety, who have inaugurated safety appliances.

MERCHANT MARINE.

The Government owns a large fleet of merchant and passenger boats, the swiftest and best boats that sail the ocean today. It also owns shipyards, the largest and most efficient in the world. As long as all of these means of transportation are now in the Government's hands why not see what the United States can do toward unifying water and rail transportation—what the United States can do toward utilizing our many navigable rivers and giving us cheap water transportation like Europe has. See what the United States can do toward placing our flag on a merchant marine, the first in the world. I believe that Government management is well worth the trial, especially in view of the fact that before the war the American flag was hardly visible on the seas, American capital being invested in boats that did not carry our flag. Just the other day our Shipping Board was about to sell at half price some of the Government's largest and fastest passenger and freight boats in the world to go out of our control and float the flag of one of our commercial rivals. I refer to the Fatherland and other interned German boats now owned by the United States.

EXPLOITATION OF RAILROADS.

Read the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission: In re Financial transactions of the New York, New Haven & Hartford R. R. Co., docket No. 6569. Report of the investigation of the St. Louis & San Francisco R. R. and others, docket No. 5933. In re Pere Marquette R. R. Co. and Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Co., docket No. 6833. Investigation of the financial transactions, history, and operation of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co., docket No. 6834. In re Financial relations, rates, and practices of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., docket No. 6319.

If you read these reports you will see how the railroads have been exploited by their private owners—the Morgans, Vanderbilts, Harrimans, Rockefellers, and others at the expense of the public, and I believe you will agree that before the Government turns the railroads back to these same men who have exploited them in the past and gives them a Government guaranty that they shall have large returns on their inflated capital the Government should see what it can do with our transportation system.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, January 20, 1920.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I beg to say that the quotation you make inquiry about from recent utterances of mine is a free translation rather than an accurate statement.

What I have said is, that the consumer catches an increase in freight rates in the shape of an accumulation of increases. He is bound to, because he is at the mercy of the manufacturer, the wholesaler, the retailer, and generally the commission man, as to each single material that enters into a finished article and then as to the article itself. On a number of occasions I have called attention to a statement of Director General Hines made in a speech at St. Louis in June last, to the effect that this ratio might be as much as fivefold. The Director General's exact words are as follows:

DIRECTOR GENERAL HINES'S STATEMENT.

"Whenever there arises any reason for an increase in cost of anything, the public has to pay the amount of the increase, and the amount of the increase in the price is several times as big as the reason justifies. So if after study of the matter it is discovered that the Government ought to have $300,000,000 additional per year to pay the operation and rental, and increases the rates accordingly, there would be danger that after the increase had been passed along to the ultimate consumer of food and clothes and other things which we all have to buy the public would pay a billion or a billion and a half on account of the three hundred million the Government would be getting, because the prices would be increased by the manufacturer and the wholesaler and the retailer. Hence I feel that in the interest of the general consuming public we ought to be exceedingly cautious about making the increcease in transportation rates. While an increase of rates beyond the 25 per cent may be necessary to take care of increased costs running from 50 to 80 or 90 per cent, yet improvements in conditions may accomplish a great deal in wiping out the deficit without any increase in the transportation rates."

I have devoted to this question a great deal of thought and some investigation, and am satisfied that Director General Hines stated the case very conservatively. Using the ratio of 5, I have said on several occasions that, based upon 1918 receipts from freight traffic, the 25 per cent increase in freight rates which the carriers propose to ask for upon return of the roads to private control would mean $875,000,000 additional which the shippers would have to pay and $4,375,000,000, or $215 per family of five—assuming our population to be 100,000,000—which the consumer would have to pay. These figures, of course, are approximate.

My belief is that attempting to reach a permanent solution of the railroad problem at a time when everything is in the flux is a hazardous proceeding, fraught with danger to the Republic.

Cordially, yours,

R. W. WOOLLEY.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. MASON,
OF ILLINOIS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, for more than five hours I have listened to this debate on the railroad bill. I had hoped for a few minutes in which I could offer suggestions, but the rule was adopted which prevents discussion. This bill that comes from the conference committee is not the Esch bill and is not the Cummins bill, and it presents new and most important questions. No living human being can read this bill and vote intelligently within 48 hours—which those of us not on the conference committee have had to read and understand this bill. I avail myself of the privilege granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, but most respectfully protest against the rule adopted which deprives us of hearing the views of many of our colleagues whose long legislative experience and great learning upon this subject would enable them to enlighten us upon many details of the bill which at first reading I confess I can not understand. My industrious colleague from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], who is a member of the committee and who has devoted his time most loyally for a year to the study of this great question, was allowed 15 minutes in which to give the benefit of his study to those of us who have been extremely busy on other questions. I share most heartily the opinion of this House as to the great ability and high character of the chairman [Mr. ESCH], and I also know this House has the same feeling of respect and confidence in the integrity and ability of my colleague [Mr. DENISON] who differs so widely from the distinguished chairman upon three of the most vital questions involved.

I congratulate my colleagues that notwithstanding the high tension, the wide differences of opinion, no attempt has been made, with one or two exceptions, to make political capital out of this most important matter, to maintain the commercial life of our Republic. I congratulate my colleagues that we are gradually reaching the point where we have courage to demand the right of free thought and speech and the consideration to give to each other that which we demand for ourselves.

Mr. Speaker, I can not go with those who are in the majority to-day. I have no apology to make and I am only using this space in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that those who have sent me here may know my reasons for not voting for this bill. I shall vote to recommit the bill, and if that fails I shall vote "no" on the final passage. I shall give only a few of my reasons for doing so. First, my most serious objection is the guaranty given to the owners of railroad securities of a return of 5½ and 6 per cent upon their real investment. Gentlemen who have cried out against the doctrine of socialism and capital, that have inveighed so strongly against guaranteeing man a living, that have cried out so strongly against paternalism, are the very first to crawl under the cloak of Uncle Sam, and say, "It would be wicked to guarantee the farmer that his crops would come to harvest, regardless of his conduct; it would be a shame to guarantee the merchant that he would make a profit on his sales, regardless of his industry and skill; it would be bolshevism to guarantee the clerks and other laborers steady employment, but it is true Americanism to give a guaranty of a return on the almighty dollar that we put in railroad stocks, regardless of the efficiency of the men hired to manage the railroads." Surely capital was never so coddled and favored as in this bill. Why not guarantee the farmer's wife that her hens will lay eggs; why not guarantee every lawyer, preacher, and doctor that they shall have enough to live on regardless of their industry and ability; why not guarantee the farmer's wife that her bread will rise and her butter will come? There is nothing that so destroys the initiative and industry of a man as to guarantee him a living; and there is nothing that so enervates the life of a corporation as would the Government guaranty. Suppose the railroad company is threatened with a strike, why need the officers of the company be interested in the wages and conditions of the men when the Government guarantees to finance the strike for the corporation? What difference does it make to the corporation how many relatives of the stockholder are appointed to sinecures? It is charged to expenses and Uncle Sam or the shipper pays the freight. What matters it whether the corporation buys its supplies from corporations which the stockholders control—paying a double price therefor? Uncle Sam will pay the bills.

Gentlemen will say the money does not go into the Treasury; that is true; but what difference does it make whether you take it out of the pocket of the citizen and give it to the railroad earner, or take it out of the farmer, merchant, and manufacturer, by increasing to him the cost of transportation? Oh! but one gentleman says to me, who is a stockholder, you took away our roads for the use of war. So we did; it was one of our many blunders. We also took away our boys from their homes, and when we got through with them we sat them down on a cold stone, made them a generous present of $60, almost enough to buy a suit of clothes and a pair of boots, and told them to go to work.

Mr. Speaker, we must return this property to its rightful owners. We have paid them a return equal to the best they have had for years. The Government has not managed the finances as well as the owners could have done, and just as patriotic service could have been had by the managers and employers in the hands of the owner. We must put those railroads back in the hands of the owners in as good condition as they were, and the revolving fund of $300,000,000 appropriated in this bill will keep them on a safe and sound financial basis. Why then need we change the whole system of law in this country by this guarantee of interests? Gentlemen say that the 5½ and 6 per cent is not guaranteed on the stock and bonds, but is a guarantee of interest upon the value of the property of the corporation. Can not gentlemen see the endless trouble that this will cause? Many of us believe that railroad stocks and bonds are largely in excess of the value of the property of the corporation. Leading railroad experts tell us that property owned by the railroads of this country is between five and six billion dollars greater than the amount represented by the stocks and bonds.

Mr. Speaker, feeling as I do that this is a favoritism toward one class of investors, that it is class legislation of the very worst sort, that it is paternalism of the worst kind, I can not and will not support this measure.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I ought not to cumber the RECORD further, but will say in conclusion, there are three classes interested in this legislation—the owners of the railroad, the laborers who operate it, and, greatest of all, the public. In my humble opinion this legislation does not take care of the men who operate the road and does not protect the public. I am an optimist and hope for the best, but I can see dangers ahead by reason of the so-called labor clause taken in connection with the guaranty clause which I have described. I agree with ex-Justice Hughes that the taking away of the earnings of any corporation and applying any part of it, directly or indirectly, for the benefit of any other person or corporation would be a violation of the Constitution of the United States. More than that, I believe it to be impracticable, for the element of human nature will prevent any such surplus, for when a corporation finds that it is likely to have surplus earnings which are to be confiscated, so much money will be needed for betterments and rehabiliments that the large amounts of money to be used for the weaker roads will never turn up in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the argument of the continuation of the barge service of the upper and lower Mississippi. True, the bill authorizes the Secretary of War to operate these barges. I have very serious doubts as to whether that part of the bill which appropriated the unexpended balance in the Treasury can be used for the operation of these barges. Knowing the "ancient" differences between rail and water transportation, I feel that if this bill is recommitted the conference committee can, by slight amendment, remove the doubt as to the legality of the use of the unexpended balance.

Mr. Speaker, if this bill is recommitted to-day, it can be brought back on Tuesday without this paternalism and with a change that will protect the employee and public, and, after a two or three days' discussion, in my opinion, will receive practically the unanimous support of this House. The question of Government ownership is not involved in this case; that is a subterfuge which worked together with the clause that we must pass this bill just as the committee reports it or have no legislation at all. This frightens no one except those who wish to be frightened. Speaking for myself, I would rather the railroads should go back to their owners without any legislation than to violate the Constitution which I have sworn to uphold. I would rather take a chance that the railroad company can command cash and credit enough to operate their trains rather than to depart from the American precedent and principles by class legislation that compels either the shipper or the Government to protect one class of investors, and particularly that class of investors who are best able to protect themselves.

Mr. Speaker, after years of legislative experience in both branches of the legislature of my State and both branches of Congress, I have learned to respect the opinions of my associates. I have seen appalling legislative actions taken, sometimes by "whip and spur" through brilliant leadership, sometimes by the artifice of quick action without fair debate, and sometimes by the clever insertion of the legislative joker. There is a large majority of this House and the Senate that will vote for this bill; but I give it as my solemn judgment that if either the Esch or Cummins bill had 30 days ago proposed a change in the law that gives the railroad companies "fair and reasonable rates," which has been the law for more than a quarter of a century, so that the law would read that the companies should be allowed to charge all expense and then be guaranteed 5½ and 6 per cent on the value of the property which they own, there would have been such a protest from our constituents that not a single man in either Chamber would have voted for that proposition.

In my district there are more miles of railroad than in any other district in the United States. Those roads in Illinois have been well managed, taking care of the stockholders and the public. The troubles we have had was when a Wall Street shark came in and got possession of a few of our roads and robbed our people by swelling the stock and bonds to what they call the "value" of the property and you are now saying by this bill to my constituents you must pay all the overhead and fixed charges as well as maintenance and operation and when our roads are made economical and efficient, when the sinecures are wiped out, when they buy their supplies in honest competition, then if the people of my State have paid in freight and passenger rates more than the 5½ and 6 per cent, then one-half of that surplus which has been wrung from the shippers of Illinois, to loan in order to build up some other road where all of the rules of honesty and efficiency have been violated—if that is not communism then I do not know the meaning of the word. The railroad security holders of this country who cry so loud against Government ownership are the very ones who want it for there is no one in the world whose guaranty they want so much as Uncle Sam's and they have secured what they want by withholding this proposition until the last few days. Have gentlemen stopped to consider the effect of this legislation upon stocks—assume for the sake of argument that the statement of the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad is correct, that the railroad property is of greater value than the stocks and bonds. The stock reports show that that railroad is selling at 43 cents and gentlemen who bought it yesterday for 43 cents by the terms of this bill are guaranteed 12 per cent on their investment if the property value is equal to stocks. The Chicago & Alton was selling as low as 6 cents Monday. If, as is claimed by some, the value of the property is equal to the stocks and bonds, then the gentleman who bought the Chicago & Alton on Monday will receive his whole principal back as interest.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, you will hear from the stock market. This conference report will be adopted by the House and Senate, and while the President and Attorney General are considering whether it should be vetoed or not the market aforesaid will tremble in the balance.

Mr. Speaker, I never bought or sold any railroad stock—I do not know the game—but if some close and official friend of the President will tell whether he is going to veto this bill or not I will agree to charter the great ship George Washington, take all of my colleagues to Paris, and furnish each one of you with 1,300 loyal attendants to do your bidding. I recommend my colleagues to watch the stock markets as a matter of entertainment, and I assure you you will not have to keep your ear close to the ground to know the opinion of our constituents.

Mr. Speaker, the amount of money, as shown by the statement by the distinguished chairman of this committee, which is to be taken from the people is simply appalling. I have the greatest respect for our one-time colleague, Mr. Sherley, whose letter has been introduced. I have the greatest respect for our distinguished chairman, and frankness compels me to state that I have not had time and do not know whether all this money demanded is absolutely necessary or not, but, Mr. Speaker, for the reasons given, if I have to vote alone, I shall vote "no" on this bill.

Conference Report on the Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAY STONE BRIGGS,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, though favoring the return now of the railroads to their owners and terminating further Government operation and control, I can not support or vote for this conference report because among other things—

First. It grants unjustifiable guaranties and subsidies to the railroads, amounting to over $1,250,000,000 annually.

Second. It practically destroys the power of the several States to further control or regulate the railroads.

Third. It stifles competition and both authorizes and legalizes vast mergers and combinations of railroads, which it is expressly provided shall not be construed as any violation of the antitrust laws.

Fourth. It sanctions and approves the merger of all express companies into one huge combination and trust and thereby destroys any further competition in that service.

Fifth. Instead of returning the roads to private ownership with an assurance of increased efficiency, reduction of vast operating costs, and economy in further operation and maintenance, preserving competition between the railroads, the conference report or bill gives promise and assurance of quite the contrary; for with its mergers and combinations, its centralization of authority and control over the railroads in the Federal Government, its guaranties and subsidies, the railroads will be permitted to operate under the vicious cost-plus system developed by the war, which will mean waste and inefficiency, to the injury of the service and financial cost to the public of hundreds of millions of dollars.

The present conference report gives far more highly centralized powers to the Federal Government and far greater loans, guaranties, and subsidies to the railroads than the Esch bill, as it passed the House, conferred. The conference measure increases the revolving fund to be loaned by the Government to the railroads to $300,000,000—$50,000,000 more than the amount carried in the House bill. It also adds the guaranty to the railroads of a net return during the next two years of at least 5½ per cent upon the aggregate value of such roads and for the continuance thereafter of such a definite guaranty and return as the Interstate Commerce Commission shall establish. In fact, the so-called 5½ per cent two-year guaranty provision is in reality a 6 per cent guaranty provision, because the report expressly authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission, in its discretion, to add to such 5½ per cent "a sum not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent of such aggregate value to make provision in whole or in part for improvements, betterments, or equipment, which, according to the accounting system prescribed by the commission, are chargeable to capital account." It is not to be assumed that with such expression in the conference report the railroads will receive less than a guaranty of a net return of 6 per cent during the next two years upon the aggregate value of the roads.

All of this is in addition to the six months' guaranty carrried both in the House bill and in the conference report, and to the funding of several hundred millions of indebtedness of the railroads to the Government over a period of 10 years. It is in addition also to the Government provision in the conference report that prior to the expiration of the six months' guaranty period no railroad rate shall be reduced without the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Moreover, the conference report, in addition to substantially destroying the power of the States to regulate or control rates, also practically deprives the States of all authority over the construction and abandonment of lines of railroads located, or to be located, wholly within any State. The bill as it passed the House protected such right. Under the conference report it is gone forever and the authority is vested in the Federal Government. It is further true, also, that under the conference report the States lose substantially all control and jurisdiction over the issuance of stocks and bonds by railroads, for such conference report expressly provides that the jurisdiction conferred upon the Federal Government through the Interstate Commerce Commission "shall be exclusive and plenary, and a carrier may issue securities and assume obligations or liabilities in accordance with the provisions of this section without securing approval other than as specfied herein."

It is estimated that the loss sustained by the Government under Government control and operation of the railroads amounts at the present time to approximately $850,000,000. This amount, however, does not take into consideration unliquidated claims against the Government which may probably increase the loss to $1,000,000,000 during the period of Government control. The rental, or so-called standard return, undertaken to be paid by the Government to the railroads was approximately $900,000,000 a year. In addition to such rental the Government advanced for betterments, improvements, and equipment a huge additional sum amounting to over a billion dollars. The conference report, however, provides that these advances for betterments and equipment must eventually be repaid.

Under the guaranty and subsidy provisions of the conference report it is extremely likely that the Government and the people will be compelled to pay in actual donations from the Treasury and through increased rates a sum greater than that lost in the operation of the railroads during the period when the Government has been operating the same; and under such guaranties and subsidies it will be the stronger and greater railroads that will profit most, because even if the provision whereby the roads earning more than 6 per cent should pay more than one-half of the excess to the United States to be used in making loans and furnishing equipment to weak roads, be constitutional—and there seems to be serious question as to such constitutionality—yet such weaker roads even in order to get such loans must provide adequate security and are not assured even of getting a guaranteed net return of either 5½ or 6 per cent upon the value of their properties, for the reason that the provision in the conference bill does not apply to each road, but only to the aggregate value of all roads. It may be, therefore, that while the rates may be increased to bring a net return of 5½ or 6 per cent upon the aggregate value of all the roads, the return to each road may differ greatly; some earning 10 per cent or more annually and some 2 per cent or less.

It is because of the vast cost and expense to the people, the restrictions, inconvenience, and harassments endured by them under Government control and operation, with the indifferent and wretched service, that the people demand the return of the railroads to private ownership; expecting better and cheaper service and freedom from the irritating trials experienced in their dealings with the Government.

Believing that this hope can never be realized under the conference bill, I must decline to support it.

Railroad Legislation Imperative.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. THOMPSON,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920,

On the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I support the conference report on the railroad bill because I consider it an emergency measure. Although it may have defects, it will safely bridge over the transition period from Government management, with its political makeshift and enormous deficits, to private management. In view of the fact that the President has issued a proclamation turning the roads back to their owners, effective March 1, the Congress can not afford to delay action leading to economic readjustments made necessary as a result of the World War.

Lincoln and the Boys in Blue.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. ANDREWS,
OF NEBRASKA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 16, 1920.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered by myself on Friday evening, February 13, 1920, before the Department of the Potomac, Grand Army of the Republic, Washington, D. C., on the occasion of the celebration of the birthday of Abraham Lincoln.

There was no objection.

The address is as follows:

"We honor ourselves to-night by honoring the memory of Abraham Lincoln. He was not only a child of the American forest, but also a child of destiny. In his early Kentucky home trees were the companions of his childhood. Wild beasts challenged his youthful courage. His stature seemed to rival the majestic pines about him. The contour of his features suggested the rugged outlines of the hills and mountains, in the midst of which he roamed with pleasure and freedom from responsibility.

EARLY MANHOOD.

"Although he sought knowledge by the flickering light of pine knots, his future thoughts illuminated the Nation and the world with the surpassing brilliancy of the electric current. In early years he passed to the broad prairies of the West, where the horizon of his vision coincided with the extreme limits of his physical possibilities. His experience as a merchant and traveler brought him into observation of the slave market, which thrilled his nature and fired his energies for future warfare in the cause of freedom. Under such environments he seemed to approach gradually more closely year by year to the heart of nature as one of his greatest teachers; in fact, Providence seems to have taken him into communion with itself and mysteriously trained him for the great service to which, under God and the will of the American people, he was commissioned in his mature manhood.

PUBLIC CAREER.

"His career at the bar, in the Illinois Legislature, in Congress, and in his memorable debates with Douglas, and his canvass for the Presidency, is frought with incidents of deep significance. In his broad survey of human rights and governmental institutions, he looked to the human soul and its native endowments as the chief corner stone from which he took all his bearings. With the skill of the mariner he sounded the utmost depths of human rights, and with the exactness and farsightedness of the astronomer he scaled the heights and fixed the orbits of the Nation and its citizens under the Declaration of Independence and our National Constitution. With clear psychological analysis and forceful logic, although not a theologian, he revealed the pathway of Divine rectitude among men with the prophetic vision of a Daniel before the old Chaldean king, and carried his convictions to a triumphant conclusion with the courage of the Apostle to the Gentiles.

THE NONEXTENSION OF SLAVERY.

"He loved peace and earnestly sought its continuance upon the ground of the nonextension of human slavery to the virgin soil of American territory. Let American citizens everywhere read with thoughtful consideration his first inaugural address, and other messages, and thus catch the inspiration of his soul and intellect in their firm devotion to the Union, the Constitution, and the Flag.

PRESERVATION OF THE UNION.

"But when the Nation was assailed by hostile guns, this man of peace clearly saw the duty of the hour. With the power of the sword he sought to maintain the institutions of the fathers and perpetuate the blessings of peace to all the States of the Union. Thus, at his call, the grandest army that had ever trod the earth came into existence to maintain the Constitution and the Union. Thus the Federal sword was drawn in defensive warfare for the sole purpose of preserving the life of the Nation.

EMANCIPATION.

"The gradual progress of events, however, logically developed the doctrine of the nonextension of slavery into the doctrine and realization of emancipation, and for the first time in our history made freedom coextensive with the limits of our National Constitution. Recount those perilous years from 1861 to 1865 and note the extent to which his thought, deeds, and character were woven into the fabric of our national history. Who could ever picture the travail of his soul in the hours and years of struggle and gloom, amid alternating clouds and sunshine?

PEACE AND THE SWORD.

"A lover of peace, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the Nation, waging war with the sword! Yes; but remember it was the sword of defense and not the sword of selfish aggression. I quote and paraphrase the following:

"'Be it in the defense or be it in the assertion of a people's rights, I hail the sword as a sacred weapon; and if it has sometimes taken too deep a dye, yet, like the anointed rod of the High Priest, it has at other times, and as often, blossomed into celestial flowers to deck the freeman's brow. Abhor the sword? Stigmatize the sword? No! For in the passes of Tyrol it cut to pieces the banner of the Bavarian, and through those craggy defiles struck a path to fame for the peasant insurrectionist of Innsbruck. Abhor the sword? Stigmatize the sword? No! For it swept the Dutch marauders out of the fine old towns of Belgium, scourged them back to their own phlegmatic swamps, and knocked their flags and sceptre, their laws and bayonets into the sluggish waters of the Scheldt. Abhor the sword? Stigmatize the sword? No! For at its blow a giant Nation started from the waters of the Atlantic, and by the redeeming magic of the sword, and in the quivering of its crimson light, the crippled Colonies sprang into the attitude of a proud Republic, prosperous, limitless, invincible.'

"Abhor the sword? Stigmatize the sword? No! For by the sway of the triumphant sword of Lincoln the boys in blue brought back the wandering stars of the American constellation and fixed them permanently in their constitutional orbits and christened the Nation anew with the blood of their fallen comrades.

"Abhor the sword? Stigmatize the sword? No! For by its victories at Manila and Santiago Spanish tyranny was banished from the Western Continent and the enslaved of the islands of the sea were elevated into the sunlight of American civilization and opportunity.

"Abhor the sword? Stigmatize the sword? No! For by its victory on the soil of France monarchy was destroyed and representative government carried to the nations of the earth.

AN OCEAN SCENE.

"One bright summer day I sat on the ocean end of a steel pier at Atlantic City, N. J. The sun was shining brightly and refreshing breezes floated shoreward with delightful welcome. The trackless waters, extending far beyond the range of vision, were calm and placid. The quiet waves, playing to and fro, revealed the ceaseless activity of the mighty deep. Yachts and sailboats were carrying pleasure seekers forth over a tranquil sea. Far beyond the great steamers were coursing the highways of commerce. From yachts, sailboats, and steamers the Stars and Stripes were unfurled and suggested this picture of the ocean as a fitting parallel to a peaceful, happy, tranquil Nation under the rule of wise statesmanship.

"The next day, however, the placid surface had given place to the rolling waves, whose white crests could be seen to the full limits of physical vision. They rapidly grew larger and stronger until they beat upon the shore as though they defied their barriers in an attempt to overflow the land.

LINCOLN AT THE HELM.

"That turbulent scene was suggestive of the rising tide of passion from the time of the Missouri Compromise in 1820 to the omnibus bill in 1854 and the presidential election in 1860, at which time at the call of Divine Providence and the will of the American people Abraham Lincoln came to the helm of the grand old ship of state on March 4, 1861. On the 12th of April following the storm broke forth in hostile fury at Sumter. Steadily, patiently, wisely, courageously he guided our ship of state through the storms and tempests of civil war. As the boys fell in battle along the way his tears mingled with the tears of relatives and friends. As the crimson flood flowed forth from the veins of American life in atoning sacrifice for the sins of slavery his soul felt the bitterness of the strife. In spirit he lived with them on land and sea and longed for the return of peace.

"By and by happy messages came announcing the surrender of Lee, and Appomattox was recorded in the history of the Republic and the literature of the world. As the days of peace were dawning upon his vision and he was beginning to realize his fond hopes for a reunited country, his blood and life were demanded as an additional sacrifice upon the altar of human passion. That cruel blow startled the Nation and filled it with grief, but the loyal men who had followed Lincoln's leadership through fiery trials of war were equal to the task and the 'Government at Washington still lives.' Although the heart is saddened by the magnitude of the sacrifice, it is, on the other hand, rejoiced by the preservation of the Nation and its remarkable progress.

"Thirty-one States divided then, 48 States united now; $16,000,000,000 wealth then, unmeasured billions of wealth now; 31,000,000 of people warring against one another then, 110,000,000 people united now under one Union, one Constitution, and one flag.

THE VICTORIES OF PEACE.

"But peace hath her victories no less renowned than those of war. When the victory of arms had enforced the recognition of our right to independence the Revolutionary heroes were confronted with the tremendous task of building a Nation that would bring into full fruition the hopes for which they had fought. Monarchy prophesied failure and earnestly sought to transform their prophecy into fulfillment, but the builders of our country laid aside the old models and went behind the governments and ruins of the past and studied the philosophy of history and government in the light of the philosophy of the human soul. Thus they pointed out the true corner stone from which the whole field of true government must be surveyed. At this crisis they declared to the world the grand doctrine of political equality. It moved before them like a pillar of fire during the dark and perilous night of the Revolution. It is one of the central ideas of our national Constitution and is to be perpetuated by an intelligent and wisely directed citizenship.

"To that great achievement the State of New York contributed the brilliant services of Alexander Hamilton, the great Constitution builder, the intellectual premier of the American Republic. No one has yet surpassed him in profound statesmanship.

NATIONAL SOVEREIGNTY.

"He was a firm advocate of the doctrine of national sovereignty and insisted that the Nation should possess at all times and under all circumstances adequate constitutional power to protect its own life and perpetuate its own existence. It must be able to suppress insurrection and internal strife and ward off hostile foreign foes.

"This Hamilton doctrine of national sovereignty may be designated as the centripetal force in American politics. It was the principle upon which Abraham Lincoln and the Union Army preserved the union of the States. Every Federal note of war sounded on the way from Sumter to Appomattox was an argument in support of the political teachings of that great patriot and statesman.

"In this connection note the fact that Abraham Lincoln did more than any other man to preserve and perpetuate the Hamiltonian doctrine of national sovereignty. Read his famous speeches delivered in the Lincoln-Douglas debates and his addresses delivered in the presidential campaign of 1860. Study carefully his inaugural addresses and his official messages and proclamations.

"Add to these the important lessons of our national history from 1861 to 1865. With such information before you, view the intellectual, moral, and patriotic characteristics of the man. Would that he could have been spared to guide the progress of the Nation through the remaining portion of his second presidential term and thereafter throw the light of his knowledge, wisdom, logic, loyalty, and patriotism upon the readjustment of our national affairs. Of course, we can only conjecture as to the measure of the loss we have sustained by his premature death and the benefits we would have gained through the continuance of his service to the country in subsequent years. Nevertheless in his life, service, and death we can study the welfare and history of our beloved country to which and for which he gave his best efforts and his life. I therefore congratulate the Grand Army of the Republic, under whose auspices we meet to-night, upon the splendid service they are rendering to the country in perpetuating a vivid memory of the illustrious Lincoln, who, to my mind, was the world's greatest commoner.

"The history of the American Republic should be studied and taught in such a manner as to awaken admiration and enthusiasm, inspire even the children with a devotion to their country, thus realizing that the voice of their country for peace and liberty is recognized around the world.

SILENT FORCES.

"These silent forces of liberty have awakened the dead and restored humanity to its rightful heritage in the domain of thought and freedom. Confronted by the leadership of that dauntless Prince of Orange, even Spain could not subdue the Netherlands. Before the third estate in France, the church, nobility, and the monarchy all went down; so in England the clergy, the nobles, the lords, and the kings all yielded to the rising power of the English commons. They dedicated American soil as the 'land of the free and the home of the brave' and transformed the old imperialism of the Nile, Euphrates, and Tiber into the individualism of the nineteenth century.

"They have led the race from the conflicts of arms to the great conquest of peace; from a cruel Nero to an Abraham Lincoln; from Louis XIV of France to the peerless Gladstone, whose silver voice rang throughout the world in behalf of human rights and justice for the Emerald Isle; from the thralldom of ignorance to the unlimited empire of free thought where the mind may soar like an eagle to the loftiest summits; from the crowns and palace of the Cæsars to the crowns of freedom and the palace of God.

LINCOLN AND THE FLAG.

"Lincoln loved the flag with all the devotion of his soul, and we hail it as our symbol of liberty, the Stars and Stripes. This banner of ours was born amidst the clouds of the American Revolution and christened by the blood of American patriots. It has been borne in triumph through foreign and domestic strife, and it waves to-day in response to man's God-given rights to intellectual, civil, and religious liberty. Let the homes, the schools, and the press of the country teach patriotism and loyalty to the Union, the Constitution, and the flag until the youth of the land are thoroughly imbued with the high privileges and sacred duties of American citizenship.

"In the hearts of Americans our flag should lead all the rest. A moment's reflection upon the constellation of national ensigns will flood the mind with wonderful suggestiveness. One reminds us of the suffering of Siberian exiles under the rule of absolute monarchy. Another recalls the reign of terror as the period of a nation's transition from monarchy to representative government. Another suggests the cruelties of the inquisition and the reign of a bloody Weyler in Cuba. Another points to the checkered history of a long line of kings and queens who sought the enslavement of the American colonists. But our flag represents the highest realization of the hopes of the race for intellectual, civil, and religious liberty.

"Our flag was dedicated to the cause of freedom by the American Revolution. The loyal citizenship of the country has always borne it in triumph against foreign and domestic foes, and to-day sustain it in its proud position among the nations of the world. Through the years 1861 to 1865, of its greatest peril, Abraham Lincoln and the 'boys in blue' preserved it, carried it to victory, and waved it in triumph over a reunited country.

"We frequently build monuments to commemorate great events and also the lives of great men. There stands the Washington Monument, reminding us of the revolutionary history of our country. It speaks the fame and influence not only of George Washington but also of the men and women who stood behind him and advanced him to his surpassing fame and glory. Here in our National Capital we can see monuments on every hand. Our streets and parks are made historic by their presence. Millions of dollars have been expended in their construction.

"The skill of artists has been employed, but Abraham Lincoln and the boys in blue built for themselves by their own deeds a monument in the history of our country and the history of the world that is imperishable. It will live as long as human memories retain the picture of the American Republic, redeemed, reunited, and freed from the last stain of human slavery. That great military contest of the sixties was the focal point to which the forces of preceding years concentrated and from which the influences of subsequent years have radiated throughout the world. Think of our country again as it was in the sixties and then think of it as it is now. If Lincoln and the boys in blue had failed, what would have been the result in the recent World War? Monarchy in all probability would have been triumphant again, but with America saved by Lincoln and the boys in blue 100,000,000 of people with almost countless billions of wealth stood behind our Army and Navy in the recent World War and enabled our brave boys to carry our flag of liberty to victory on European soil. Thus the monument erected by Abraham Lincoln and the boys in blue to themselves in the history of the world shines on and on with increasing luster and glory with the passing years."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM CONNALLY,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker, the measure now before the House, the conference report on the railroad bill, is of such importance and affects so directly every consumer in the United States that I desire to state some of the reasons prompting me to vote against the measure:

First. It requires the Government to pay to the railroads the amounts due for rental during Federal control, but allows the railways to fund their indebtedness to the Government, amounting to approximately $1,300,000,000, and at their option to owe the Government this sum for 10 years.

Second. It guarantees the railroads' income for six months after termination of Federal control. If the roads do not earn the fixed income with high rates the Treasury is to make good the deficit.

Third. The bill appropriates $300,000,000 to be loaned to the roads in addition to the sums already due the Government by the roads. The Government does not make loans directly to other corporations or citizens. Why to the railroads? This feature is especially objectionable at this time, when the public debt amounts to $26,000,000,000 and there is such pressing need for economy.

Fourth. The construction or extension of lines of railroads are prohibited unless consent is given by the Interstate Commerce Commission. This may seriously interfere with the building of new railroads in undeveloped sections which badly need them and centers control in Washington.

Fifth. It provides for the consolidation of all railway lines into a limited number of systems. To do so will tend to eliminate competition both as to service and rates and will build up a railway monopoly. The constitution of Texas prohibits the consolidation of competing or parallel lines, yet under the bill this provision will be practically nullified.

Sixth. The bill practically destroys the State railroad commissions and the control of the States over their own commerce. I quote from paragraph 4, section 416, of the bill:

> Such rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices shall be observed while in effect by the carriers parties to such proceeding affected thereby, the law of any State or the decision or order of any State authority to the contrary notwithstanding.

Its effect will be to centralize in Washington the powers of which the States are divested. Shippers and others having business with the roads will be required in many cases to lodge their complaints at Washington instead of with their State commissions. Each State should be permitted to control its own local affairs and to fix the rates on commerce purely within the State.

Seventh. Section 422 of the bill requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix rates at such a level as will produce a revenue of not less than 5½ per cent on the aggregate property value of the railroads of the United States. The Interstate Commerce Commission will not complete its valuation of the railroads for several years. The roads so far valued by the commission have been found to be worth much less than the sums for which they are capitalized. The statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission estimates that rates will have to be increased $1,214,000,000 annually over present rates under this provision. This enormous increase will fall on the shippers, on the merchants, on every bale of cotton, on every ear of corn, on every cow that is shipped on a railway; yes, on every article of merchandise which the consumer purchases; on every plow and farming implement that the farmer employs to produce his crop; on every article and commodity shipped by rail. There are roads which on account of lack of business, poor location, or inefficient or wasteful management, do not deserve to earn large incomes, just as there are merchants and farmers and lawyers and doctors who, through poor management, do not succeed. Should the rates be continually raised to produce a profit to such roads? To so raise the rates for the benefit of the inefficient and poorly located roads will with uniform rates unduly increase the income of the prosperous and well-managed roads. The public will pay high rates on all roads in order to assist and support those that are found to be halt and maimed and crippled through the financial juggling of their owners.

This section will breathe life into railroad stocks, will give them a value they never possessed before; will transmute water into real value, and will convert into revenue-producing property that which but yesterday represented speculators' and promoters' securities. It is significant that the bond and stock market quotations on railroad securities, even before the bill has been passed but merely on its prospect of passage, have gone soaring upward. Every dollar added to such securities by the passage of this bill will come from the pockets of the people in the form of rates and charges on the commodities which they produce and the articles which they consume.

Eighth. There is no question as to the return of the railroads on March 1, 1920. The President has already issued his proclamation to that effect. Mr. ESCH, the chairman of the committee, stated in his speech that the President has no power to recall the proclamation. On February 20, 1919, a year ago, in this House, I voted to return the roads to private control. The roads are going back, but in handing them back I am unwilling to place unheard-of burdens upon the people of the whole United States for the benefit of railway owners who are clamoring for the passage of this bill.

Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT D. STEPHENS,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, this legislation is of such importance that I desire to state, very briefly, my reasons for opposing the conference report.

Before doing so, I want to say that the argument that this report must be adopted or the railroads will remain in the hands of the Government is not in accord with the facts.

No act of Congress is necessary to enable the roads to be returned to their owners. The legislation under which the Government assumed control and operation of the roads provides they may be turned back to the owners by proclamation of the President. He has proclaimed that they shall be returned on March 1.

The general public will rejoice, I am sure, when this return is effected. Operation of the railroads by the Government has been so unsatisfactory that now the ones who advocate Government ownership comprise only a small class.

Having always opposed Government ownership, I am glad that this object lesson on that subject was given under legislation that was only temporary, rather than to have had it under permanent law. It is so much easier to get rid of the burden.

I am opposed to the guaranty by the Government of a fixed return or profit. It provides that the railroads shall receive "a sum equal to 5½ per cent of the aggregate value" of the railroads; and in the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission the amount may be increased to 6 per cent.

It is fair to say that no money will be taken out of the Treasury to make this guaranty good; but the burden falls on the public, for authority is given the commission to fix rates that will produce this return.

Why should the owners of railroad stocks be guaranteed a fixed return on their investment? What other citizen of the Nation has a guaranty that his business will be profitable? The farmer, the merchant, the banker, the lawyer, the physician must take all the risks and hazards incident to his work. If losses come, they must be borne, and the arm of the Government is not lifted to help. If bad judgment is exercised, the one guilty of it must pay the penalty and pocket the loss; but if the owners of the railroad make mistakes, the Government takes care of them under this bill.

During the war the people were urged to buy bonds. There are several millions of owners of "Liberty" and "Victory" bonds. Patriotism inspired their purchase. What guaranty have they that they can get face value for them? None. It is true, also, that the rate of interest on these bonds is much less than that guaranteed to the owners of the railroads.

Again, this is a vicious provision, because it tends to lessen the incentive for efficiency and for competition. Whether a road handles little or much traffic, it gets the guaranteed return.

There is another provision of the law that is unfair. If, by excellent management and by reason of availability of traffic, a road makes more than the guaranteed profit, one-half of the excess is taken from that road and turned into a fund to be used for the road that did not make the full guaranteed profit.

This is unfair. It penalizes industry, good judgment, and progressive methods on the one hand, and it puts a premium on lack of industry, bad management, and inefficiency on the other. I can not agree that this is right.

No one would argue that if one farmer was successful and by reason of industry, frugality, and good management made 10 per cent on his farming investment that one-half of the profit above 5½ per cent should be taken away from him and given his neighbor who was less industrious, less frugal, less efficient, and less successful.

Many good lawyers hold that this provision is unconstitutional; that it violates the provision of the Constitution that "property shall not be taken without due process of law." Whether the provision be constitutional or unconstitutional, it is unfair.

Then I am opposed to the consolidation features contained in section 407 of the bill. Under this every railroad in a State may consolidate and form one system. This may serve to destroy competition and to lessen efficiency. This is wrong in principle and would, undoubtedly, work badly in practice. It is violative of the constitution of many States.

THE LABOR PROVISIONS.

The American Federation of Labor is violently opposed to the bill because of the provisions relating to labor. It is claimed that these provisions are too stringent and rob labor of some of its essential and fundamental rights.

I take the opposite view that these provisions are too weak; and that is one reason that I have for voting against the conference report. We should write a bill that has teeth in it, like the provisions of the Cummins bill.

The bill reported by the conferees is no stronger than if no mention had been made of the question of labor disputes. In fact, it would have been better to have omitted the subject entirely than to have dealt with it in such an ineffectual manner. It displays a lack of courage that is disgusting; it exhibits a weakness that is pitiful.

What are these provisions? First, it is provided that "railroad boards of labor adjustment may be established by agreement" between the carriers and the employees. This is simply a voluntary arrangement, and neither party can be bound by the finding of the board.

Second, there is created a "railroad labor board," composed of nine members to be appointed by the President. This board is authorized to decide any dispute involving grievances, rules, or working conditions, in respect to which any "adjustment board" certifies that it is unable to reach a decision, or upon the application of the chief executive of any carrier, or organization of employees interested, or upon the petition of not less than 100 unorganized employees interested, or upon its own motion if the dispute is likely to substantially interrupt commerce. No one is under any obligation, much less compulsion, to accept the finding of the board.

Listen to the provision that relates to a refusal to follow or abide by the decision of the board:

SEC. 313. The labor board, in case it has reason to believe that any decision of the labor board or of any adjustment board is violated by any carrier or employee or subordinate official or organization thereof, may, upon its own motion, after due notice and hearing to all persons directly interested in such violation, determine whether, in its opinion, such violation has occurred, and make public its decision in such manner as it may determine.

Each member of the labor board receives a salary of $10,000 annually and the secretary receives $5,000, making $95,000. Then there will be dozens of clerks and investigators to be paid, rents for offices, large printing bills, and many other expenses, so that this process will cost many hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of dollars annually.

What will be accomplished? Absolutely nothing. After this large expense, either party may refuse to accept the decision; and the board is powerless to do anything, except to inform the public as to its decision.

Two citizens disagree over the settlement of a business matter. One sues the other and the court, after hearing all testimony, reaches a decision as to the merits of the proposition; and it renders a judgment that is enforceable. It has the authority to do so. But suppose the law gave the judge authority only to say to the litigants, "I have reached this conclusion about this matter, this is the right thing to do"; and later, if either party refused to abide his decision, the law authorized him simply to publish his decision in some newspaper. Would anyone have any respect for the law? There is no one that would not say that such a proposition would be ridiculous. Yet, that is simply on a parity with the provisions of this bill.

PROVISIONS OF THE CUMMINS BILL.

I have said that I favored the provisions of the Cummins bill on this subject. What are they?

SEC. 30. It shall be unlawful for two or more persons, being officers, directors, managers, agents, attorneys, or employees of any carrier or carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, as amended, for the purpose of maintaining, adjusting, or settling any dispute, demand, or controversy which, under the provisions of this act, can be submitted for decision to the committee of wages and working conditions or to a regional board of adjustment, to enter into any combination or agreement with the intent substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation for the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce, or in pursuance of any such combination or agreement and with like purpose substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation for the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce; and, upon conviction, any such person shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That nothing herein shall be taken to deny to any individual the right to quit his employment for any reason.

SEC. 31. Whoever knowingly and with like intent shall aid, abet, counsel, command, induce, or procure the commission or performance of any act made unlawful in the last preceding section hereof shall be held guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

This is the kind of law that ought to be enacted. It is what conditions justify and what the interests of the public demand. When, as lawmakers, we write this law less strong we fail to serve the general good, the interests of all the people.

This provision in the Cummins bill has been viciously attacked by the Federation of Labor, and it has been said that it, in effect, puts men in servitude, forces them to work against their will. The answer to this is that the statement is untrue.

The last sentence of section 30 reads:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be taken to deny to any individual the right to quit his employment for any reason.

Individuals are not denied the right to quit employment at any time for any reason or without any reason. Each person is permitted to decide the question for himself.

It does prohibit—two or more persons * * * to enter into any combination or agreement with the intent substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation for the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce—

And so forth, and provides a penalty for a violation of the law.

The right to quit an employment is a personal right; it is an inherent right. The right to strike, what the Federation of Labor is claiming, is a very different proposition.

On this proposition I quote from a speech of Senator UNDERWOOD. It seems to me to answer the claim of the federation that the "right to strike" is an inherent right:

Some men speak of the so-called right to strike as if it were a human right, a right that belonged to men, like the right to live, the right to breathe, the right to work in an organized capacity.

* * * * * * *

To strike! What does it mean? Men now talk of the right to strike as if it were the right to quit work. The right to strike and the right of the individual to quit his employment are two very different things.

One is the exercise of individual liberty; the other is the exercise of aggregate force to accomplish a purpose, to carry out the desire of the men engaged in the strike or of the organization that has ordered the strike. One is a negative force that hurts no man; the other is an active force that injures many.

* * * * * * *

A strike is what it implies in its own terms. It is a blow, a blow directed with an object behind it, and it is the only way that it makes it effective. Is the Congress to stand here and allow any organization whatever to deliver a blow against the American public, or is it our duty to see that substantial justice is done to all concerned without the delivery of the destructive blow?

The Cummins bill provided for a tribunal to which all matters pertaining to wages and working conditions might be submitted. This is fair to all concerned—labor, capital, and the public. Yet Mr. Gompers said before a committee of the Senate:

I say with the full understanding of the words I employ that the surest way of creating dissension, greater unrest, possibly leading to a strike, is the provisions of that bill. No other agency could provoke it more than that bill.

He is reported to have said also that if the bill became law he would not advise organized labor to obey it.

These statements evince a spirit of selfishness, a spirit of disrespect for law that is amazing. They are startling, too, coming as they do from the head of organized labor, a representative of millions of workingmen. If he truly represents the mind and spirit of such a large class of our citizens, the perpetuity of the Nation is threatened; a grave menace is in our midst.

LABOR UNIONS.

I am a friend of the man who works. I am not an enemy to labor unions. Indeed, many of their objects are excellent and have my sympathy and good wishes. They have done much good in the past. Rightly directed, they will do much good in the future.

But they must be controlled. They must be protected against themselves. The public must have protection against them. They must not be allowed to dominate the Government nor override the interest of the whole people.

As a result of their efforts wages have been increased, hours of work have been shortened, working conditions have been improved. These things are good. I am glad that they have been accomplished. No good citizen begrudges them these things.

But in dealing with them we should remember that no class, even though it be the Federation of Labor, should be permitted to dominate the whole Nation. Ours is government by law and not by classes. All classes, whether labor organizations or the capitalistic class, are selfish, because human nature is selfish. Selfishness never yielded to any power without a struggle, and that is the reason for the opposition to a law against strikes.

Labor demands not only the right to strike, but it also claims the right to say that men shall not work unless they belong to the union. It demands the "closed shop," thereby attempting to say to certain men that you shall not work at certain trades and in certain places unless you belong to our union. They gnash their teeth and threaten to defeat Congressmen for reelection when an effort is made to protect the public; yet they do not hesitate to say to an individual that you must not work, although your family may be in want, unless you belong to us.

On the subject of strikes, it is rather interesting to note the following information furnished by the Department of Labor:

There were approximately 6,000 strikes between April 6, 1917, and November, 1918.

It will be observed that this is the period during which we were at war with Germany, when the life of the Nation was at stake, when our boys were fighting and dying on foreign soil, when every instinct of patriotism was urging us to sacrifice, when we were being urged to produce more in order to help win the war.

In the face of these facts, how can any man doubt that there should be stringent legislation on the subject of strikes?

SOMETHING THE UNION DOES NOT CONSIDER.

Labor unions were organized as a protest against the injustices that labor had been receiving at the hands of capital. They have had a long, hard, fierce battle. They have come to look upon it simply as a fight between the two forces. They forget that there is another party in interest—the public.

Let a general strike come and tie up the railroads, who will suffer most? Capital will lose its earnings for the period of the strike. Labor will lose its wages during the time. The public, if the strike lasts a month, will suffer great distress. There is not a city or large town that would not be filled with men, women, and little children hungry and suffering and dying for lack of food. The farmer would be deprived of his market and would want for many things that come to him from the outside world.

In a fight between individuals the innocent bystander frequently sustains the most serious injury. In a strike the one not engaged in the contest—the public—is most certainly the greatest sufferer. Because this is true we should not hesitate to prohibit strikes in the interest of the general good.

Again, when it is a contest between the railroads and their employees over a demand for increased wages, they are not the only interested parties. All the citizens of the Nation are interested. If wages are increased, there comes a demand for increase in rates. The people pay both the profits of the railroad and the wages of the employees. Hence, we have another reason for the establishment of a tribunal to pass upon matters of dispute.

TRIBUNALS FOR ALL EXCEPT UNIONS.

The interest of the people requires that certain acts be prohibited. Therefore we have criminal laws. If a citizen violates one of the laws, he may be haled before the court and punished.

If citizens disagree on a matter of business, or if one injures another, the matter may be adjudicated in the court, and the order of the court must be obeyed.

If one destroys property of another or defames his character, he may be forced by a court to respond in damages for his act.

A railroad desiring to increase its freight or passenger rates must apply to a commission for authority to do so. It is a violation of law that is punishable to increase rates before authority is granted.

Of course the labor unions favor the courts and tribunal just referred to. They also favor "safety appliance acts," "workmen's compensation acts," and all legislation that improves their working conditions, and they believe in their rigid enforcement.

But they object to being compelled to submit their grievances to arbitration. They want to stand in a class to themselves—to be higher than the law, greater than the Government.

They demand all the rights given them by law; but when the Government attempts to regulate them, they say, "Lay not thy unholy hands upon us."

NO SPECIAL PRIVILEGES.

In Labor, a newspaper published in this city and representing the labor organizations, this statement was made in a recent issue: "Labor wants no privileges, no favors." Yet, in the same article, it argues that labor is menaced because it is proposed to legislate against strikes.

In a memorial recently presented to Congress by the railroad brotherhoods protesting against this legislation, the language of John Adams is quoted:

> Government is instituted for the common good, for the protection, safety, and happiness of the people, and not for the private honor or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men.

They quote the language, but proceed in the same document to demand a special privilege for a class, the unions. They assert that legislation against strikes is an effort on the part of capitalistic groups to crush unionism. I contend that it is an attempt on the part of the advocates of it to protect the people against the selfishness of a class.

Mr. Speaker, it is my judgment that all classes will profit by this kind of legislation. If a tribunal is provided to pass upon disputes between the railroads and employees, then no one should suffer. Capital, labor, and the public, as all three are interested, will all be represented.

While the matter of dispute is being heard, the roads will continue operations. Capital will continue to receive profits, labor will continue to earn wages, and the public will continue to receive the benefits that comes from uninterrupted transportation service. It seems to me that this kind of legislation will really prove beneficial to the employees of the railroads.

The only risk about the matter is that the tribunal might not be fair or might not reach a correct conclusion. If this is a legitimate argument against the establishment of the tribunal, then the same argument might properly be made for the abolishment of all courts, legislatures, and governmental commissions; or, in other words, to abolish government entirely and let each man take care of his own interests.

Recognizing the strength of organized force and the principle of human selfishness, it is apparent that the Government will, sooner or later, have to protect itself against unionism, not destroy the unions but restrict them to legitimate objects and activities. To think that they will voluntarily restrict themselves to such objects and activities is the blind optimism of faith that is unwarranted by the history of mankind. If we continue to indulge in such optimism, we will, ere long, be confronted by the pessimism of fact and wake up to find the Government controlled by a class. We should respond to the sharp commands of common sense and act now.

IN CONCLUSION.

I am opposed to Government ownership of railroads.

I am opposed to the Plumb plan, under which the Government would own the railroads and the employees would operate them.

I favor the immediate return of the railroads to their owners.

I believe that the Government should exercise strong and comprehensive control over the roads, and that in regulating their operation justice should be done to the owners, the employees, and the general public.

I believe that conditions justify strong regulatory measures in regard to the employees of the roads, so that strikes may be prevented.

Government Ownership of Railroads.

Shall we have class government or government by all the people?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. IRA G. HERSEY,

OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920,

On the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, when the railroads were taken over by the Government two years ago I expressed myself then against Government ownership of railroads, and I said at that time that in my opinion Government control of railroads during the war would forever settle the question of Government ownership in America and would restore the roads to their owners.

When the Esch bill returning the railroads passed this House last November I again discussed at some length the bill and opposed the antistrike provisions in that bill, and I am pleased to say that in this report of the conference committee the antistrike provision has been eliminated.

I did not intend to discuss the conference report. I was content to vote for the conference report because I greatly approved it. It has made a better bill than the one that passed the House. The New England roads have been protected from bankruptcy by the so-called guaranty provisions.

The arbitration court to settle labor disputes between the railroads and their employees has been made more satisfactory by a fair court of arbitration formed by taking three members from organized labor, three members from railroad management, and three members representing the public. This court, it seemed to me, ought to have met the wishes and desires of railroad labor in the settlement of all their differences, and it did seem to me that the conference report should be unanimously adopted and ought to be satisfactory to both capital and labor.

A situation, however, has developed that has forced me to express myself further upon this matter, and I shall do so plainly and in no uncertain terms, so that my position as a Member of Congress may be fully known and understood.

On the 21st day of March, 1918, after the President had taken over the roads under his war powers Congress enacted the following law:

> That the President, having in time of war taken over the possession, use, control, and operation (called herein Federal control) of certain railroads and systems of transportation (called herein carriers), is hereby authorized to agree with and to guarantee to any such carrier making operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission, that during the period of such Federal control it shall receive as just compensation an annual sum, payable from time to time in reasonable installments, for each year and pro rata for any fractional year of such Federal control, not exceeding a sum equivalent as nearly as may be to its average annual railway operating income for the three years ended June 30, 1917.
> That the Federal control of railroads and transportation systems herein and heretofore provided for shall continue for and during the period of the war and for a reasonable time thereafter, which shall not exceed one year and nine months next following the date of the proclamation by the President of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace.
> * * * * * * *
> The President may relinquish all railroads and systems of transportation under Federal control at any time he shall deem such action needful or desirable.

The President has recently issued his proclamation saying that on the 1st day of March next he shall return the railroads to their owners; and this Congress has the solemn responsibility to-day of carrying out this contract made with the owners of the railroads, and we are under obligation of law to return these railroads to their owners with sufficient legislation to save the roads from bankruptcy and to protect the rights of all the people of this Nation.

In spite of the fact that Congress by this report has presented a railroad bill that is satisfactory to the railroad owners, satisfactory to the manufacturers, satisfactory to the banking interests, satisfactory to the business interests of the country, satisfactory to the shippers and farmers, and satisfactory to every interest except that of organized labor, it is surprisingly strange that radical labor leaders are to-day gathered in great numbers at the Capital of the Nation in a desperate attempt to hold up Congress and to coerce the Members in the discharge of their sworn duties.

Let us for a moment examine some of the events that have brought about this deplorable condition. During the late World War the railroads of the United States under Government control were brought to the verge of bankruptcy. From the Public Treasury we gave a billion dollars to the Federal managers to run the roads. We increased the freight rates 50 per cent. The owners were burdened by immense debts imposed upon them against their consent by the administration in its extravagant and incompetent conduct of these roads.

At the close of the war the President went to Paris to negotiate the peace treaty. He took with him Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and Gompers succeeded in placing labor clauses in the peace treaty so as to internationalize labor, and on the return of the President and Gompers to America it was annouunced that labor had been given special preference in the treaty of peace and the League of Nations, and the President, in his message to Congress, said that labor had gone as far as it could go; that there must be a turn in the road; that labor was now in the saddle and Congress must settle the labor questions. Thereupon Gompers announced to his followers that in the future representatives of labor from all the other nations would meet here in Washington and help to further internationalize labor and to settle the hours of labor and the scale of wages for all the world.

The President further announced that on the 1st day of January, 1920, he should return the railroads to their owners. As soon as he had issued this proclamation organized labor got busy under the leadership of Gompers and other radical labor revolutionists. One, Foster, a socialist and labor agitator of the revolutionary class, took charge of organized labor in the great steel works, and under Foster's influence and direction there was called a general steel strike throughout the United States, and all this approved by Gompers. One, Lewis, another radical labor agitator, took charge of the coal mines of the Nation and inaugurated a nation-wide strike of the miners to freeze and starve the people—all approved by Gompers. One, Plumb, a shrewd lawyer and a radical socialist of the revolutionary kind, took charge of the railroad labor of the country and put forth his wonderful "Plumb plan" of settling the railroad problems and the future policy of railroad transportation.

His plan, in brief, was to have the United States Government purchase the railroads from their owners, but not to assume any part of their indebtedness; not to guarantee their stocks and bonds, but only to pay for the actual value of the railroads and their equipment. This would cost between twenty and thirty billion dollars. This did not feaze Mr. Plumb, however, for we could easily raise this immense fund, he claimed, by issuing bonds of the Government.

He went further in his "Plumb plan," so called. After Government ownership he would have the railroads conducted, operated, and managed by organized railroad labor. There would, of course, be no such a thing as stocks and bonds. A majority of the directors would be composed of railroad employees and they would have the controlling voice in the management of the railroads, in the conduct of transportation, and also the power to fix their own wages, their working hours, and all the conditions under which they should labor. Further than this, organized railroad labor would share equally with the Government in all profits that came to the railroads.

When Plumb was before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee he said:

> It is not unrest that confronts us. It is revolt because of industrial conditions no longer to be borne.

Then he spoke about revolution, and he was asked by the committee what he meant by revolution, and he said:

> I think it means that the men have reached the level of diminishing existence. They can not stand any more. They will cease to serve. If we do not work out a solution soon, we will have no chance to work it out, and if the forces of reaction prevent the adoption of this program by lawful means we know the way of history.

Under his influence, indorsed by Gompers, organized railroad labor declared a general strike on all roads to be effective February 17, 1920. The socialists, the Bolshevists, the anarchists, the radical revolutionists are all largely confined to the great cities of the country. To carry out the Plumb plan, to bring about a revolution to change our form of government, to inaugurate a soviet government general strikes were called all over the country with the consent and approval of Gompers.

New York had a strike among her longshoremen and those who handled her shipping and freights, and this tied up her transportation and commerce. From that city went out bombs through the mails to men who opposed radical labor organizations, bombs to men like the late Representative Burnett, of Alabama, who, as chairman of the Immigration Committee, was in favor of deporting these radicals to the country from which they came. Bombs that were placed on the doorstep of Attorney General Palmer wrecking his beautiful home in Washington and were intended to kill him because, as Attorney General, he had prosecuted these radical revolutionists. Bombs to Congressmen who dared to vote for legislation that would curb these anarchists and revolutionists in America.

This spirit of revolution fanned by radical labor leaders spread to other cities. Omaha labor agitators and I. W. W. radicals shot down soldiers in uniform in the streets of that city because they dared to keep the peace. In Seattle and on the western coast the I. W. W. radicals and labor agitators inaugurated a general strike of the street car systems, of the police of the city, and of all the transportation service running into the city, so that the people might be starved or frozen into submission to their demands. Mayor Hanson, a man of courage, took charge of the situation, and said:

> The labor unions must now cleanse themselves of their anarchistic element or the labor unions must fail. They are on trial before the people of this country. I take the position that our duty as citizens stands ahead of the demand of any organization on the face of the earth. The union men, the business men, the churchmen must first of all be citizens. Any man who owes a higher allegiance to any organization than he does to the Government should be sent to a Federal prison or be deported.

In Centralia during a parade four returned soldiers were shot down in cold blood by these bloodthirsty I. W. W.'s.

Organized radical labor failed in Seattle and they failed in New York. They next turned their attention to Boston, where its police force had been organized and unionized. They struck without warning, and the city for several days was in the hands of the revolutionists. Her great governor, however, had the courage to put down this revolution with a strong hand, and revolutionary labor failed to accomplish its object in Boston, in spite of the assistance and approval of Gompers.

The courts issued an injunction against the striking miners and saved the Nation from freezing. The coal strike proved a failure, and radical labor was again defeated.

This gigantic conspiracy on the part of the radicals, with the knowledge and consent of Gompers and organized revolutionary labor, failed to turn this Government by force over into the hands of the communists, the revolutionists, the I. W. W.'s, and soviet Russia, and in this first battle labor lost heavily.

By a new proclamation of the President the railroads were to go back to their owners March 1, and organized labor then turned its attention to the Capitol at Washington in an attempt to coerce Congress to adopt its revolutionary measures which had failed by force. From force and revolution, from the shotgun and the bomb, radical labor now turned to politics to accomplish their purpose, to obtain Government ownership of railroads and all other industries.

An alliance was formed between the American Federation of Labor under Gompers, the steel workers under Foster, the railroad brotherhoods under Plumb, organized labor in the coal mines under Lewis, the I. W. W.'s, the Bolshevists of Russia, and the ignorant criminal classes to bring about if possible through legislation and political coercion Government ownership of railroads under the Plumb plan.

Plumb, emboldened by his success in uniting all the forces of organized labor for his socialistic scheme, gave out a proclamation to the country that the Plumb plan of Government ownership of railroads was to be extended to take in all the industries and public utilities of America in an elaborate scheme for the participation of organized labor in public management and profits of every class of industry, and that as an entering wedge organized labor was now determined that the railroads should not go back to their owners for two years, at least, and that they would enforce this demand by a drive to coerce Congress.

Poisoned propaganda was sent by the Plumb-plan leaders by the carload from Washington to all labor organizations and to all classes of workingmen, setting forth the beauties of the Plumb plan and that labor must strike and enter upon a political revolution for the control of all the industries of the country. Plumb said that from small strikes they were to go to minor mass strikes, to general strikes, and from general strikes to revolution if they did not obtain from Congress what they desired.

Their demands came in the shape of a threat to Members of Congress, insisting that they should extend the time for the return of the roads two years more because labor was not now prepared to inaugurate its government-ownership system, but would fully develop its plans in the coming two years, and that in the meantime the railroads should be run under practical Government ownership, as they have been conducted for the past two years. All this in the face of the facts in possession of Congress and the country that Government ownership of railroads has been a miserable failure in this and all other lands.

On the 19th day of February, 1918, during the debate in the House over legislation authorizing the President to take over the railroads in time of war, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] gave an able and illuminating speech upon Government ownership of railroads. He reviewed the history of Government ownership of railroads in all the nations that had adopted it. He took up the history of these roads in all the States that had ever operated railroads under State ownership, such as North Carolina, Missouri, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania, and showed how these States had abandoned State ownership and operation and had adopted the policy of private ownership.

He also took up the history of Government ownership in the United Kingdom, in Canada, Germany, Russia, Switzerland, Japan, Australia, Belgium, Austria, and South America, and showed from indisputable data figures and the best authorities that railroads built and financed by the Government had failed and that many of them had adopted private ownership as the only means of saving their nation from great extravagance and loss.

He compared Government-owned railroads in these countries with privately owned railroads in the same countries, and showed conclusively how the privately owned railroads had blessed the people, while Government ownership had been its greatest curse. He compared the scale of wages and rates between Government ownership and private ownership in all these countries, and showed undisputably that under private ownership and management the rates were lower and wages higher than under Government ownership.

He also showed by railroad returns up to 1917 that in the United States wages are the highest paid to any railroad employees in any country in the world, and that the freight rates are the lowest. It would be a very useful task if some of these Government-ownership and Plumb-plan agitators would read this great speech of Representative FORDNEY; they would learn something from the experience of the world.

Last Friday in this House the able gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] made a very forcible and valuable speech against Government ownership, and his remarks ought to be read by all those who wish to change the policy of this country in the settlement of its transportation problems.

The worst feature of the Plumb plan ownership of railroads and other industries would be the great political power that would be given to the party controlling the administration to rule and govern the elections through the influence and power of labor in Government-owned railroads.

Hon. Edward N. Hurley, former chairman of the Shipping Board, a man of great business ability and financial skill, when asked what had impressed him most about his job said: "The efficiency of private ownership and operation as compared to public ownership and operation."

But in spite of all these experiments of the past, that ought to govern the country and Congress in its future policy, to-day the House and Senate is besieged by these labor organizations, under the leadership of Foster, Lewis, Plumb, and Gompers, demanding that they should not only control and govern the great industries of the country, but that organized labor should dictate the coming elections and control the vote of every Member of Congress hereafter elected.

On the 9th day of this month the executive council of the American Federation of Labor issued the following proclamation:

Wherever candidates for reelection have been friendly to labor's interests they should be loyally supported. Wherever candidates are hostile or indifferent to labor's interests, they should be defeated and the nomination and election of true and tried trade-unionists or of assured friends should be secured.

Complying with the instructions of the last convention and the labor and farmer conference of December 13, 1919, the American Federation of Labor announces its determination to apply every legitimate means and all of the power at its command to accomplish the defeat of labor's enemies who aspire for public office, whether they be candidates for President, for Congress, for State legislatures, or any other office.

Frank Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, says:

The trade-unions would support any candidate regardless of party if he would pledge himself in favor of the demands of these wage-workers.

Gompers issued his proclamation to-day, in which he says:

Of this one thing you may rest assured, that the day of reckoning is at hand for all of those who are in antagonism to the cause of labor, and for those who are subtle and equally guilty even though they clothe their actions in the robes of pretended friendship.

Organized railroad labor, under the leadership of Mr. Plumb, issues to-day its proclamation and sends it to all the Members of this House, as follows:

LABOR WILL SEPARATE THE SHEEP FROM THE GOATS.

Labor will print roll calls in the House and the Senate on the pending railroad legislation.

The "folks back home" will have an opportunity to learn just how each Senator and Representative voted on the most important issue before the American people.

There will be no chance to dodge.

Those who vote for Wall Street will have to do so in the open.

Those who vote for the people will have the facts presented to grateful constituencies

"Choose ye this day whom ye shall serve."

The morning papers in Washington print the following proclamation of labor for the benefit of Congressmen:

LABOR ANNOUNCES WAR ON CONGRESS; ONLY UNIONS' FRIENDS TO BE VOTED FOR—FEDERAL LEGISLATURE "HAS FAILED IN ITS DUTY" AND IS "REACTIONARY," AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR CIRCULAR CHARGES—NATIONAL NONPARTISAN COMMITTEE APPOINTED TO CONDUCT POLITICAL CAMPAIGN—POINTS IN THE OFFICIAL CIRCULAR.

The American Federation of Labor calls upon all affiliated and recognized national, international, and brotherhood organizations, State federations of labor, central labor bodies, local unions, and labor's friends and sympathizers to unite and give loyal support to the nonpartisan political campaign now set in motion.

This political campaign must begin in the primaries. The record of every aspirant for public office must be thoroughly analyzed, stated in unmistakable language, and given the widest possible publicity. Labor's enemies and friends must be definitely known. To this end the American Federation of Labor has created the national nonpartisan political campaign committee, and it now calls upon all affiliated and recognized labor organizations to create district and local committees and to cooperate with the national committee and coordinate its efforts.

The future welfare, the very ability of the trade-union movement to carry on its work for humanity, depends upon the success of the campaign herewith inaugurated.

There can be no hesitancy.

There must be no turning aside.

The time for vigorous and determined action is here.

Every Member of this House this morning received a notice from organized labor that unless they vote against this conference report for the return of the railroads to their owners, and unless they support the Plumb plan for two years more of Government ownership, and further pledge themselves to support all the demands of labor unions in the future, then organized labor will enter at once every congressional district and defeat at the next election all those Members who to-day dare to vote against the demands of these radicals and revolutionists.

I have always been a friend of organized labor. I have voted in State legislature and in Congress for every needed reform that would protect and assist labor in obtaining better working conditions and reasonable hours of work. I have supported on every occasion measures that labor might have a court of arbitration, disinterested and unprejudiced, before which they could come and settle all differences with their employers.

I refuse, however, to lend my influence and vote to further the demands of Plumb and Foster and Lewis and Gompers; to internationalize labor and make of this Government a soviet Government like that of bleeding and unfortunate Russia.

When I went before my people as a candidate for Congress I stated to them frankly and squarely my position upon all public questions. Among other things, I stated as follows:

On the questions of labor and capital my position is well known. I have stood in the past for the interests of labor, for the man who works with his hands, for the toiler, for the wage earner, for the rights of the laborer, for abolishment of child labor, for shorter hours of toil, for more comforts to the toiler, and for equal rights of the workman in his contest with organized wealth.

At the same time, I am for simple justice to the great interests of wealth and capital. I am not for Government ownership of public utilities. I do not stand for the destruction of great combinations of wealth, but I do stand for the control and regulation of all public utilities, trusts, and combinations. I believe that our Government should control and regulate these great forces in the interests of the people, so that capital may not be afraid to invest, so that great combinations of wealth, under Government control, may build more railroads, bridge great rivers, construct canals and dikes, develop the resources of the land, and give labor its wage, and receive its reward measured and weighed out to it with even-handed justice.

That statement is my position to-day. I have not deceived my constituents. They, I believe, have faith that I will do what I believe to be best for the whole country, and by so doing I will do justice to every man. It matters not whether I am returned in the next election to this Congress. It matters not that I to-day, with others of my colleagues, take into our hands our political life and defy those who shall enter into politics in the next election to defeat us unless we forswear ourselves to the future policies of radical labor.

It means much, however, to the future of this country whether its institutions and its industries shall live and flourish and prosper or whether socialism and anarchism and revolution shall succeed in this Republic.

Who saves his country saves all things,
And all things saved do bless him;
Who lets his country die lets all things die,
And all things, dying, curse him.

Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Appropriation Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM S. VARE,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 25, 1920.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Speaker, the Appropriations Committee again has recommended the dissolution of the United States Subtreasuries in Baltimore, New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, New Orleans, and San Francisco, to take effect December 31, 1920, or at an earlier date, to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Legislation abolishing these offices in former years was passed by the House and eliminated from the bill in the Senate, and I am hopeful the Senate again will restore the item for the continued maintenance of the Subtreasury offices.

Speaking for the Subtreasury in the city of Philadelphia, virtually all of the trade bodies testified to its efficiency and are desirous of it being retained.

Public sentiment demands that the Government funds should be handled and controlled by the Government and not by what is practically a private corporation.

The Subtreasury supplies the banks of the city and State with notes and coin of denominations required, it pays all Government checks, including salary and pension, it furnishes pay rolls for the navy yard, arsenals, and Government vessels, and performs other functions which are of great convenience to the public.

Giving this work to the Federal reserve bank would disorganize the system of Government payments and receipts and cause serious confusion and inconvenience. I doubt if it could be handled as economically and satisfactorily as at present. Should an attempt be made to transfer the work, the Philadelphia reserve bank would find itself unable to provide vault space for the trust and reserve funds now in the Subtreasury vaults. The local reserve bank has been granted the use of vault space in the Subtreasury. Its own vaults are insufficient for its needs. The logical solution would be the use of the Subtreasury vaults, as at present. No economy would result because of the transfer of their custody to the Federal reserve bank.

I submit a report of the amount of business done at the Philadelphia office for the fiscal year ending June 30, last:

Statement for fiscal year ended June 30, 1919.

I further submit extracts from a letter Hon. William G. McAdoo, former Secretary of the Treasury, wrote to the Speaker of the House favoring the retention of the Subtreasuries, which may be found in House Document No. 1777:

THE FUNCTIONS PERFORMED BY THE SUBTREASURIES.

The duties and functions of the Subtreasuries may be stated generally as follows:

Issue of gold certificates on gold deposits.
Acceptance of gold coin for exchange.
Acceptance of standard silver dollars for exchange.
Acceptance of fractional silver for redemption.
Acceptance of minor coins for redemption.
Acceptance of United States notes for redemption.
Acceptance of Treasury notes for redemption.
Acceptance of gold and silver certificates for redemption.
Cancellation (before shipment to Washington) of unfit currency.
Exchange of various kinds of money for other kinds that may be requested.
Remittances from United States depositary banks of their surplus deposits of internal-revenue, customs, money-order, postal, and similar funds.
Deposits of postal savings funds direct.
Deposits of money-order funds, direct and indirect.
Deposits of post-office funds, direct and indirect.
Deposits on account of 5 per cent redemption fund.
Deposits of interest on public deposits.
Deposits of funds belonging to disbursing officers.
Funds deposited for transfer to some other point through a payment by a Subtreasury located thereat.
Encashment of checks, warrants, and drafts drawn against the Treasurer of the United States and presented at a Subtreasury for payment.
The payment of United States coupons and interest checks.

In addition to the foregoing the Subtreasuries have the custody of a large part of the reserve and trust funds, consisting of the gold coin and bullion and silver dollars deposited to secure gold and silver certificates and greenbacks.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS NOT SUPPOSED TO PERFORM SUBTREASURY FUNCTIONS.

The Federal reserve act does not expressly or by implication contemplate the substitution of the Federal reserve banks for the Subtreasuries, nor would it in my opinion be possible or advisable, if possible, to attempt such a substitution.

Federal reserve banks are private corporations, just as are the national banks. The duty of providing the necessary storage vaults and of assuming the custody and control of trust funds could not be imposed upon the Federal reserve banks by legislation.

Aside from the custody of the trust funds of the Government the Subtreasuries perform a highly useful service to the public in making exchanges of money, supplying money and coin where needed, and reducing the cost and expense of shipments of currency and coin from a common center.

It is necessary to maintain the facilities and conveniences provided by the Subtreasuries in the large centers of business in the country, such as the cities in which the Subtreasuries are now located.

Even if these particular functions could be transferred to Federal reserve banks where they exist the service rendered by the substituted agencies would have to be compensated for. This would involve expense to the Government, while at the same time the facilities provided might not be as thorough and satisfactory as those supplied by the Subtreasuries themselves.

SUBTREASURIES WELL AND ECONOMICALLY ADMINISTERED.

"It has been stated by the Efficiency Committee that the Subtreasuries are, generally speaking, well managed, and perform their duties with a reasonable degree of dispatch at no excessive cost."

It is submitted that if the present work performed by the Subtreasuries is efficiently and economically transacted, as stated, and admitting that their functions must remain a necessary part of the present financial machinery of the country, is it practicable to assume that the work now performed by the Subtreasury system can be as economically accomplished for the Government, or as acceptably performed for the convenience of the public generally, as by the present trained clerical force engaged in the performance of this work?

It would appear that nothing would be gained by disrupting this organization and closing to the public the conveniences of these institutions in the commercial centers in which they are located.

UNWISE AT THIS TIME TO UNSETTLE ANY PART OF THE FINANCIAL MACHINERY OF THE COUNTRY.

With the Federal reserve banks taxed to their utmost capacity to take care of the numerous financing operations of the Government, and the Subtreasuries handling a larger volume of work than ever before, it seems ill-advised to suggest or contemplate at this time any drastic change which could in any way tend to upset or unsettle the present financial machinery of the country.

THE EXISTING COOPERATION BETWEEN THE FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS AND THE SUBTREASURIES ADVANTAGEOUS.

It is felt that the finances of the country are rather strengthened than otherwise by having the Federal reserve banks, private corporations on the one hand, and the Subtreasuries, Government institutions, on the other, each performing in thorough cooperation their separate functions as at present, and affording to the commercial interests of the country every facility and convenience for the transaction of public business.

NO FINANCIAL ADVANTAGE.

It is represented that if the work now performed by the Subtreasuries should be transferred to the Federal reserve banks, the expense incurred would necessarily cause the Government's share of the profits to be correspondingly reduced. Therefore it can be of no financial advantage to the Government to transfer the functions of the Subtreasuries to the Federal reserve banks, for the Government must pay for the continuance of this work wherever performed.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. AYRES.

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, the people throughout the country have been laboring under the idea that it is necessary to pass this measure to turn back the railroads to private ownership. They seem to have forgotten that the roads were taken over by the President by proclamation and will be turned back in the same way. This prevailing notion that it takes an act of Congress to return the roads is no doubt due largely to the propaganda carried on for the past six or eight months by the railroad interests.

The President by proclamation took control of the railroads December 24, 1917, and on December 24, 1919, he issued his proclamation that on March 1, 1920, he would return the roads to private ownership. It needs no legislative act to release Government control; all it requires is legislation to empower the Government to make proper and just settlement with the owners of the roads.

Anyone supporting this measure can not go before his people and justify his action on the ground it was necessary to bring about cessation of Government control, and therefore can not justify it on the ground that public sentiment demands it. Public sentiment may and no doubt does demand the return of the roads to private ownership, but does not demand that in surrendering Government control to also surrender the rights of the people with it.

I am fully conscious of the overwhelming sentiment throughout the country for a speedy return of the railroads. I think I know how this has been brought about. Partly on account of the Railroad Administration, whether intentionally or not, inconveniencing and working hardships of various kinds on the traveling and shipping public in many and divers ways. I have often felt that many acts on the part of many of those in charge of the operation of the roads under Government control were premeditated and done with malice aforethought, for the sole purpose of making Government control so odious and unpopular it would forever destroy any idea or sentiment for Government ownership. In this I am of the opinion they have succeeded but for one thing, and that is the passage of the present measure. I am satisfied it will not be a year before everyone affected by this bill—that is to say, the railroad owners, railroad laborers, shippers, and the public generally, all except the bond and stock holders—will be clamoring for a repeal of a part if not all of this measure, and if not repealed, you will hear more argument, not only for Government control, but ownership, than ever before.

In addition to the acts on the part of many connected with Government control which disgusted the public, there was another factor that helped to create this overwhelming desire for the return of the roads to private ownership; it was the propaganda that has been carried on for months by the railroad interests. This was for the purpose of creating such a sentiment as to enable them to demand and get such privileges at the hands of Congress, demands so unfair and unreasonable they would not have received a passing consideration at any other time or under any other conditions. They capitalized this overwhelming sentiment and desire on the part of the people for a return of the roads so as to enable them to win the greatest victory ever won by the selfish and special interests. No Representative in Congress could at any other time have supported such a measure and face his constituents with a satisfactory explanation. I am not so sure when the people once realize how their rights and interests have been surrendered to these special interests, there will not be a reckoning. If they do not know it now, they soon will know that it was not necessary to make such a surrender of their rights in order to return the roads to private ownership.

I am willing and ready to have the roads returned on March 1, as the President has proclaimed, and I am ready to vote for any measure necessary to enable the Government to make a just and fair settlement with the road owners; but I do not feel it necessary in doing so to surrender the rights of the people generally, and especially in my own State, nor do I intend doing so knowingly by voting for this measure.

Chapter 97 of the 1915 revised statutes of the State of Kansas provides among other things the duties and powers of the public utilities commission relative to fixing rates, joint rates, rules, and regulations governing railroads. Paragraph 8340, or section 13, specifically sets forth it shall be the duty of the commission, upon complaint or upon its own initiative, to investigate all rates, joint rates, and so forth, and after such investigation, if the commission should find such rates, joint rates, and so forth, are unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory, it shall have power to fix and order substituted for them such rates, and so forth, as are just and reasonable. It is also empowered to regulate any unjust or unfair service, and many other powers and duties are given to this commission, which is conferred on the court of industrial relations, its successor, all to the benefit of the people of my State.

Chapter 256 of the 1917 session laws of Kansas provides how this commission or industrial relations court can make or cause to be made a just and equitable distribution of cars upon the application of a shipper to the commission.

Paragraph 8367 or section 39 of the revised statutes of 1915 provides how the commission or court can compel compliance with its orders.

I am assuming all these provisions are still in full force and effect and not repealed, as I have not seen the act creating the court of industrial relations. However, after the passage of this act by Congress what power or authority is left for the State of Kansas to fix and regulate rates? None. When the shipper desires to present his complaint that the rates are discriminatory and unfair, or the service is unjust or desires and applies for an equitable distribution of cars, he can come to Washington instead of going to Topeka and apply to an already overworked, overcrowded Interstate Commerce Commission.

The railroads to my knowledge have on many occasions tested the constitutionality of the Kansas law and the validity of its most vital and useful sections, but it has stood the test and has on innumerable occasions been the safeguard especially of the grain and stock shippers and, as for that matter, all shippers; but on the passage of this bill to-day the industrial relations court is deprived of jurisdiction over such matters, and is useless, so far as such powers and duties are concerned.

This measure provides that when the Interstate Commerce Commission promulgates a rate or rates, such rates, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices shall be observed while in effect by the carriers, parties to such proceedings affected thereby, the law of any State or the decision or order of any State authority to the contrary notwithstanding. I notice, however, there is a provision in the bill which reserves to the States the exercise of its police power to require just and reasonable freight or passenger service for intrastate business. But how? Listen. Except in so far as such requirement is inconsistent with lawful order of the Interstate Commerce Commission made under the provisions of this act. That is some police power left the State now, is it not?

I am aware of the taunts and accusations made that those of us who oppose this bill as it is, are catering to the labor unions and to farmers' organizations, and so forth, opposing it. This is absolutely unfair, for each and every Member of this House is placed in the position where he has to vote for the bill just as it is or vote against it. No chance or opportunity is given to even offer or suggest a single amendment or change; no chance to eliminate the vicious provisions in it and retain the good provisions; so in order to vote for the good provisions you have to vote for the objectionable features or else vote against the bill as a whole.

No Member of Congress, with the exception of the conferees who framed this compromise bill, has had an opportunity to study any of its provisions except one or two of the most vital and conspicuous, and I might say vicious, sections. They are told to take it whether they like it or not; shut their eyes and swallow the dose and trust to the results.

We have done all we agreed to do when these roads were taken over by the Government. The Government was asked by the owners or those interested to take them over and operate them during the war. It did, and paid a sum equal to their average income for the three years prior to Government control, which was the so-called test period and which was in reality the best ever experienced by the roads. Naturally we agreed, if not directly then impliedly, we would turn them back in as good condition as when received. This we did in every respect, and in many respects much better. That we might fulfill our contract it was necessary to take from the taxpayers of this country $854,000,000. This was appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States as operating expenses and is a complete loss to the Government.

In addition to this the Government has advanced to the roads out of the Treasury about $1,250,000,000. This bill carries an appropriation of $200,000,000 more, and we have been informed by a letter from the Director of Finance to-day that $436,000,000 will be necessary as soon as the roads are returned. This makes a total of $2,740,000,000 taken out of the Treasury for the benefit of the roads.

And this is not all. Section 210 of this bill creates a revolving fund to be taken from the Treasury, the purpose of which is to loan to the railroads on long-time notes. This amounts to $300,000,000. In addition to this the bill provides a guaranty for the next six months to the roads that they will receive the standard return as paid them during the war, which is estimated at from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 on the roads controlled by the Government, and to be real liberal with the special interests this section also provides a guaranty for six months to those roads never under Government control during the war nor since, which amount is estimated to be from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000.

It is predicted by those in a position to know, or at least make a fair estimate, that this six months' guaranty will in all probability cost the Government from $400,000,000 to $450,000,000.

It seems to me it is time to stop complying with these unreasonable demands, but instead of that we are now confronted with the most unconscionable demand ever made of any Congress of the United States, and as far as I know any legislative body of any nation in the world. That is, to compel the Interstate Commerce Commission to so fix freight rates as to enable all railroads of the country to receive at least a 5½ per cent return on the aggregate value of the roads for a period of two years from September 1, 1920.

This provision not only empowers but directs the Interstate Commerce Commission from time to time to increase the freight and passenger rates of the various roads to meet this return of at least 5½ per cent to 6 per cent. Some of the proponents claim this is not a guaranty. It may not be in the sense that it is taken out of the Treasury of the United States, but it is taken out of the pockets of the people of the United States, and as a matter of fact it works a greater hardship on the people than if taken out of the Treasury direct. If taken direct, it would have to be replaced by income and excess profits and such taxes, while by this method it is taken from the poor and rich alike by adding to the already high costs of the necessities of life.

In this connection I would like to quote from those who ought to be well prepared to give estimates as to how this provision will affect the people as a whole. Mr. Robert Woolley, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, made a statement over his own signature that the railroad bill as proposed means an immediate increase of freight rates of 25 per cent to meet the pledges made. He further states, based on 1918 freight receipts, this 25 per cent increase will mean $875,000,000 additional freight rates to the roads. He also said that the shipper passes this along to the consumer and on back to the producer of the raw material who stands the cost of the transportation. This means the farmer and stockmen and manufacturers and the consumers pay the bill.

Director General of the Railroads, Mr. Hines, made a statement that the increase of 25 per cent on freight rates would increase the article transported at the rate of 400 per cent to the consumer. That is to say, taking Mr. Woolley's figure of a $875,000,000 increase in freight rates, it would mean $4,375,000,000 increase in costs to the consumers throughout the country.

It is freely predicted, in order to meet this guaranteed return of 5½ per cent as provided in this bill, it will mean an increase of 25 per cent, but from 25 to 40 per cent in freight rates. This means millions of people who are not able to pay an income tax because of the high cost of living and who are struggling to provide the bare necessities of life will be compelled to pay still higher prices—and for what? That the security holders of the railroads may have a guaranteed income for the next, you might say, two years and a half.

This section further provides that the roads throughout the country be divided into groups or regions by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that the rates be uniform in each region. That is to say, when the rates are increased on one road they must be likewise increased on all other roads in the same region, whether this increase is required by the necessities of the remaining roads or not. This means that in order to increase freight rates on a road that is not making sufficient money or profits, although this road may never have made a profit for its investors before the war, and never would have, except for this guaranty, the roads making sufficient profits even under the provisions of this bill must also increase their rates. It means the farmers, stockmen, manufacturers, and shippers generally in my State, who live along roads which do not need this heavy increase in freight rates in order to make a fair return, or as for that matter a return of 5½ per cent, are forced to pay increased rates as provided in this bill in order that roads, perhaps a thousand miles away, which never were and never will be able to pay its investors a penny, may have a 5½ per cent to 6 per cent return.

There is another feature of this same section 422, which is so manifestly unfair and unreasonable as to disgust any fair-minded man with such legislation—that is, if a road should make a net return of over 6 per cent one-half of the excess shall go into a Government fund, controlled by the Interstate Commerce Commission, for the purpose of loaning it to other roads or of buying equipment to rent to other roads. In other words, without due process of law it takes the property of an institution honestly and efficiently managed and gives it in the way of loans and rentals to another institution, which may have been mismanaged or exploited by its operators, thereby penalizing honesty and efficiency and rewarding inefficiency. If this is a just and wise provision, to say nothing of the question of its constitutionality, I must admit I have no conception of what is fair and honest.

I have read the opinion of ex-Supreme Justice Hughes, rendered to the committee having in charge this bill, in which he holds this provision absolutely unconstitutional and void. I may not have had as much confidence in him as a presidential candidate as many did, but I do have confidence in his ability as a jurist; but whether this provision be constitutional or not, is it fair and just?

It has been stated, and so far it has not been denied, that this guaranty feature of section 422 of this bill was conceived and prepared by a prominent railroad president, Mr. Warfield, who is also chairman of an association of holders of railroad securities said to represent 90 per cent of the total amount of securities in the United States. If this it not true, let some one in authority deny it. There is no denying the fact that there has been a wonderful and powerful organization here in Washington directing and managing a propaganda in behalf of the railroad interests, and it has succeeded in getting through the most pernicious and vicious measure that was, to my mind, ever enacted.

I wonder what this Congress would do if the farmers and stockmen of the country would come here and demand we pass a law guaranteeing them against drought or an epidemic; or that we guarantee them a 5½ per cent return on the aggregate value of their properties; or that we divide them into regions and provide all who make a return of over 6 per cent must put one-half the excess in the pot to be loaned to or buy equipment, machinery, and stock for some fellow who never did make a living on his farm, and never would?

Oh, but some will say, "This is pure demagogy." Well, let us see if it is. We know that when the war came many railroads had practically ceased to function and within 60 days from the time they were taken over would have been in the hands of receivers. Their managers or operators confessed their inability to stem the tide. This condition was brought about in many instances by the exploitation of the roads. But it matters not the cause, at that time when the Nation needed every avenue and means of transportation in its struggle for life and existence, that which should have been its main support was a dismal failure, which was a disgrace to the management of the Nation's greatest enterprise. There was but one horn of the dilemma for the Government to take. It had to act and act at once. It took over the control of this great transportation system. It had to retain for its management those familiar with its workings. To have done otherwise meant disaster.

As to whether or not all connected with the administration of these roads gave their unselfish and patriotic efforts to make it a success will have to be decided later by some method, but it cost this Government hundreds of millions of dollars to repair the wreck delivered to it by those who in many instances had exploited these systems. To-day it is ready to hand these roads back to their original owners in much better physical condition in every respect, we are informed, than when taken. Who was it said, "Take our roads or they will cease to function"? It was the operators and managers of the systems and the security holders of the roads. And now that we are ready to turn them back, who is it making such unreasonable and inconceivable demands? It is, as has been said, the owners of the railroad securities. Therefore, if it is a mistake for the Government to guarantee one class of business, it is a mistake for it to guarantee another.

I realize that I run the risk of being called a rank demagogue when I call attention to the fact this Government took possession of millions of young men during the war; took them from the farm, the factory, shops, and banks, from every avenue and industry, and sent them to make the supreme sacrifice if need be. Thousands of them made it and many thousands returned physical wrecks for the rest of their lives, and hundreds of thousands of these young men were forced to surrender lucrative positions or abandon a prosperous business to receive the paltry sum of $30 to $33 a month. They endured the trials and hardships incident to war. When the Government got through with them it returned them, but not to their original positions, for thousands of them found their positions taken by others or perhaps the business left behind dissipated. Who has come forward with a plan for the Government to loan them millions upon millions of dollars on such security as they may be able to furnish and appropriate thousands of millions of dollars to reimburse them for their losses and guarantee them a return of 5½ per cent to 6 per cent on their investments for a period of two years? This may sound demagogy to some, but I feel these young men are entitled to at least as much consideration for the sacrifices they have made as the holders of railroad stocks and bonds, most of whom remained on this side of a submarine-infested ocean.

When the people of this country begin to realize that owing to this law their freight rates have been increased from 25 per cent to 40 per cent, and that the Government has sustained a loss of hundreds of millions of dollars in order to carry out its various guaranties under this bill and thereby add millions and probably billions of dollars to its indebtedness, and all for the benefit of the bond and stock holders of these roads, I believe they, and as well some of their representatives in both Houses of Congress, will fully realize that the overwhelming desire for the return of the roads was capitalized by selfish interests, which enabled them to put through Congress the most unfair and vicious measure ever enacted.

The Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. MANSFIELD,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under the general leave granted I shall avail myself of the opportunity to state some of the several reasons why I shall cast my vote against the pending railroad bill. Being opposed to Government ownership or control, I had hoped that a measure would be presented to which I could have given my support, and regret that such is not the case.

Still the bill is not totally bad, but, on the contrary, contains much that is commendable, much that I should like to vote for. Like many other measures that have been before the Congress the past few years, it is a mixture of good and evil, and we can not vote for the one without also voting for the other. If we adopt the bill we must adopt it as a whole, and then there will be fastened upon us, perhaps for all time, those features which are objectionable. If we reject it, there will still be an opportunity to enact those features which are desirable. I regard the latter course as preferable.

I intend no criticism of those who have labored so hard and so earnestly in the preparation of this measure. They are men of wide experience, great ability, and unblemished integrity. Their purpose has been to construct a law that will give to the country the best results possible under existing conditions. Perhaps no others intrusted with such a stupendous undertaking could have been more successful. There are many rival and conflicting interests to be considered. There is approximately $20,000,000,000 worth of property to be dealt with, owned by 600,000 people, and operated by 2,000,000 more, with contentions almost incapable of being harmonized. Then, last but by no means least, there are a hundred million taxpayers who pay all the bills and who naturally expect—and rightly so—the best service obtainable, and at the lowest cost possible consistent with that service. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, there are more than 500 Members of the law-making bodies to pass upon these measures, no two of whom entertain identical views as to every phase and detail of the complex questions involved.

Then, again, Mr. Speaker, we all know how easy it is to criticize that which has been done by others, but how hard it is to construct something better to take its place. With these thoughts foremost in my mind, I would not presume to vote against the bill that has been produced under these most extraordinary circumstances if it were not for the fact that I consider some of the objectionable features as being fraught with the most serious consequences and dangers.

As to the guaranty of profits to the railroads, I shall dwell lightly, that feature having been thoroughly covered by many others. In my judgment this guaranty is not only wrong in principle, but will lead to many other wrongs. Everything of this kind is a precedent for the future, and when we guarantee certain profits to the owners of railroads not only upon their legitimate investments but upon their watered stocks and winded bonds as well, others will take advantage of the precedent to make similar demands. Labor may say—and just as consistently—that it should have a certain per cent over and above the high cost of living. The farmer, who feeds the world, might want a guaranty not only against actual loss, which he frequently suffers, but of a certain per cent of profit upon his investment and labor. Can we consistently grant it to the one and deny it to the other?

We have in Texas, the State in which I reside, a constitutional provision prohibiting the consolidation or merging of parallel and competing lines. We have cherished this provision for many years, and considered it as a safeguard of the people's rights. That provision will be nullified by the adoption of this bill. I prefer that we of Texas shall decide for ourselves when and how to amend the constitution of our State, and I am for granting this privilege to every other State of the Union.

I am also unalterably opposed to giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission any extension of powers or authority over intrastate traffic. The pending bill virtually destroys State railway commissions and places all roads under Federal control. Federal control through the Interstate Commerce Commission might be preferable to Federal control through a director general, but to either of these I prefer State control in all intrastate matters.

The provision in regard to car service is particularly objectionable, as under it the people of Texas might be made to suffer on account of the failure of roads in other States to make provision for their necessary equipment. When shippers in the several States who desire cars or other equipment for their urgent needs shall be compelled to come to Washington to secure them, this provision is destined to become exceedingly unpopular. Not only will they have to come to Washington to secure the cars, but after arriving here they will be met by the conflicting demands of other localities, and in all probability many will return to their homes in utter disappointment. As a consequence cattle may die by hundreds in time of drought, crops may rot in the fields or else greatly deteriorate in value.

Nearly 30 years ago the State of Texas amended its constitution in order to provide for a State railway commission. This amendment was brought about under the guidance of the late Gov. Hogg. Under that constitutional provision the railroads of that State have been successfully operated for more than a quarter of a century. The roads have been prosperous, labor was generally contented, and the public was satisfied. The enactment of this bill virtually wipes out everything that has been accomplished by the people of that State in the Government control and operation of the railroads within its borders. For these and other reasons, I shall vote to recommit the bill. Failing in that, I shall vote "no" on final passage.

The Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. SINCLAIR,

OF NORTH DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920,

On the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Speaker, the transportation system of this Nation is of vital importance to the welfare of the whole people. It is the artery through which the commodities of the farmer and producer flow to the ultimate consumer. That the railroads had failed to perform this function efficiently and well under private management, prior to our entrance in the great World War, no one will gainsay. The traffic had become so congested and cloyed that Government management was the only solution if we were to win the war. That the great task of taking care of the Nation's transportation needs during the past two years has been carried on so successfully is a matter of wonder and admiration. It is to be expected that there should be criticism of the management at times. The Government was primarily getting the work done, and had no time to consider the business as a dividend-paying proposition. Under normal peace times that feature can be tested out and the relative merits of private and Government management fully determined.

THE INTEREST OF THE PUBLIC.

The pending legislation has been too often considered either from the standpoint of labor or that of capital. To my mind there is a far more important party at interest, and that is the public. I represent a district of producers, whose largest interest in the railroad question is that of paying the freight, and I venture to say that the great unorganized public constitutes the majority of the constituents of every Member of this House. Most of the farmers of the United States are opposed to the return of the railroads to private management. They have been fighting for years for just and reasonable freight rates that will permit the business of farming to prosper. They have lost confidence in private management. At a time when thousands of farms are being abandoned, and hundreds of thousands of farmers are making a bare living, it behooves us to give careful thought to our basic industry—agriculture—from which all prosperity for the Nation springs.

RETURN OF THE ROADS A BLOW AT AGRICULTURE.

The return of the railroads alone to private management is a blow at agriculture, but to return them with a guaranty of 5½ per cent dividend on their aggregate value will involve an increase of freight rates that must be borne directly by the farmers of this country. The increase in freight rates is already estimated by the railroad managers at from 25 to 40 per cent, and will compel the farmers to pay the roads at least $200,000,000 more a year for carrying their products to market than would be the case if they remained under Government operation. Farmers must sell their product in the open market and can not shift freight charges to the consumer. How they can meet a raise in railroad freights and stay in business will be one of the most important question of the future.

INCREASED COST OF LIVING.

The Director General of the Railroads has estimated that an increase of freight rates of $1 is reflected in an increase of four or five dollars in the price of the article transported. This will mean that the cost of living will go up from four to five billion dollars as a direct result of the return of the railroads, and will result in a far greater tax upon the public than any deficit to date from Government operation. As an illustration of this we have only to consider the situation in which the farmers of the Middle West will find themselves. The prices paid for all farm products are set in the great terminal markets, whether these products are grain, stock, or other produce. The farmer gets the central market price for the articles he sells, less the cost of freight to that market. Any increase in freight charges is a direct reduction in the price received by him. All the machinery and whatever else he needs for the operation of his farm he must buy in the central market, and the cost in freight to his local station is added to the cost he must pay. Consequently an increase in freight rates hits him both ways. The farmer is vitally interested in the establishment of fair and just freight rates, and as the producer of the food of the country his interest in cheaper transportation becomes that of every consumer in the land, since transportation charges is the largest single item entering into the cost of living. Under Government control the freight charges have been based upon the actual cost of operation plus a fair rental for the use of the roads, and with a return to normal peace conditions we have every reason to believe that the cost of operation can be reduced. In the proposed bill there is every tendency to increase rather than decrease the expenses of operation, for the reason that the efficiently managed roads must give to the Government one-half of what they make over 6 per cent. The incentive, therefore, will be to refrain from showing a profit by keeping expenses at a maximum figure. In the case of the weaker roads or those poorly managed, the rates will have to be increased in order to wipe out any deficit. So that no matter to which class a road belongs, there is bound to be a gradual increase in the rates. I believe that I am qualified to express the views of the farmers on this question, for as one of them—having been a grain producer in North Dakota for over 20 years—I have paid thousands of dollars in freight charges, and I am frank to say that I would prefer to entrust to the Government the proper adjustment of rates than to be at the mercy of selfish private interests.

ALLEGED EXCESSIVE COST OF GOVERNMENT CONTROL.

There is a popular argument to the effect that Government control of the railroads has cost the country several hundred million dollars. This idea is supported by the fact that railroad operation has been more expensive the last two years than prior to the war. But those advancing this argument overlook the fact that the operation of all private enterprises has correspondingly increased in cost. We have but to refer to the report of the business of the United States Steel Corporation, which is perhaps the best-managed private enterprise there is in the country. For the year 1918 its operating expenses increased 151 per cent over that of 1914. For the corresponding years the operating cost for the principal railroads of the country increased only 102 per cent. The opponents of Government control have constantly held that the increase in operation during these years was due to inefficient management, when, as a matter of fact, there has been a great advance in wages and in the prices of commodities that go into equipment and improvements. Comparing the results of Government control of the roads with that of private control of all other enterprises of the country, we will no doubt find that unified administration has actually been an economy even greater than that stated above.

One of the principal railroad systems showed an annual surplus of $70,000,000 to $80,000,000 in prewar years, after the payment of dividends upon stock and interest on bonds. In the first year of Government control this same system, operated by the same men, reported a deficit of $77,000,000. This huge deficit, registering a sudden drop in earnings of almost $150,000,000, did not hurt the bondholders. They continued to draw their interest, as the Government had guaranteed payment. Nor did the deficit hurt the stockholders. They, too, were protected by the Government against loss of their dividends. The people as a whole had to stand the loss. It is said that the officials of this system were hostile to Government operation. Is it possible that their hostility had some effect on their efficiency as employees of the Government? This instance of the shrinkage of the earnings of this road is the more remarkable because it constitutes nearly one-third of the total deficit of all railroads under Government operation during the year 1918. The total cost of Government control for that year was $236,000,000. Three-quarters of this total loss was reported by the seven leading railroad systems, most of them being highly profitable before taken under Federal control.

When the Government took control, 36,000 miles of railroads out of the 256,000 miles were paying neither dividends nor interest on their bonds. Figures were presented to the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce in January, 1919, showing that in 1906 only 3 per cent of the roads were in the hands of receivers, while in 1916 about 26 per cent of the mileage was then in the hands of receivers. In other words, under private control over one-fourth of the railroads were in an insolvent condition. The Government was obliged, under the terms of the financial guaranty under which it took the roads over, to meet all deficits on the poor roads as well as on the strong ones which so promptly developed deficits. Friends of public ownership and operation will take due note of the fact that these weak roads soon began to grow prosperous under Government reorganization, while the strong lines, under the same efficient management that they had formerly enjoyed, showed a decline in profits. From all the information available the only proper inference to be drawn by a fair-minded public is that where Government management was given a real test, as in the case of the smaller roads, it proved to be entirely satisfactory. That it was not so in the case of the stronger roads was probably due to the resistance of the management unsympathetic to Government control.

The entire average increase in freight and passenger rates from 1914 to 1919, taking the country as a whole, has not exceeded 33 per cent, while the average increase in the prices which the public has paid for the products of private enterprise in that time has been from 60 to 150 per cent.

GUARANTEEING PROFITS.

The question naturally arises under the provision to guarantee profits upon a fair valuation of the railroads, What is to be the basis upon which that valuation is determined? The reports from the Interstate Commerce Commission indicate that the work of valuation of the railroads which has been going on for six years will not be completed for two years longer. Hence the only available figures at present are those submitted by the roads themselves on which to base the guaranty. It is estimated that the market value of railroad stocks on the average is but 60 per cent of the face value. Is it not reasonable to expect, as a result of this legislation, that an increase in the market value of railroad stocks will follow? This is legislating value into private stocks, and if it can be done in the case of railroads, why can it not be done in the line of other industries? Heretofore we have relied upon competition to fix just and reasonable rates. Now we are forced to fix a rate that will yield a guaranteed profit without the power to control expenses or dictate the management, and with no assurance as to the quality or value of the service rendered.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL SHOULD BE EXTENDED.

The experiment of Government control of railroads has not been fairly tested. Conditions during the war and since the armistice have not been normal in a business way. The primary motive in private control has been to make profits while that of public control is service. Under normal peace times that service is bound to improve. With fair conditions public control of industry is nearly always more satisfactory to the whole people than private control. In my own State of North Dakota we have had some recent experiences along this line. We were threatened with a great coal strike last fall, with severe winter weather coming on. The State government was forced to seize and operate the mines. During the period of State operation a greater tonnage of coal was produced and at a lower cost. There was a reduction of approximately 50 cents to the consumers on every ton mined. It was amply demonstrated that Government operation of this industry was an entire success both from the standpoint of production and that of economy. Likewise in the matter of hail insurance. The State furnished this insurance for over 13,000,000 acres of crops last year at a cost of 28 cents per acre. That same insurance had formerly cost the farmers of my State 70 cents per acre. The demonstration mill and elevator now in operation by the State made a profit of 83 per cent on the original investment during the first 111 days of its existence, at the same time paying to the farmer 13 cents per bushel more for his grain than he could get from the old-line elevators. In addition to the foregoing examples of State industries we have the Bank of North Dakota, which opened for business July 1, 1919. It was organized at a cost to the State of about $23,000. It now has deposits approximating $18,000,000, and in the first six months of operation, out of its profits, has paid back to the State treasury the initial cost of organization of $23,000, put $40,000 to surplus, and has over $11,000 in the undivided profits account. At the same time these profits were made all expenses are fully paid, and the rate of interest has been reduced to borrowers about 2 per cent. I call attention to these small governmental activities merely to show what can be done under Government control and operation of industry when efficiently and honestly managed. While admitting that none of these industries is directly connected with transportation, yet I doubt not that the same gratifying results could be obtained by the Government management of the railroads. In my opinion, it would be the part of wisdom for this Congress to extend the Government operation of the roads for two years, during which time a fair and thorough test of the transportation problem could be had, and the relative merits of private and public control fully demonstrated. A succeeding Congress would then have the facts and knowledge necessary to intelligently pass upon this most vital question and settle it in a manner fair to the investors and satisfactory to the great American public.

Shall We Guarantee Billions to Others and Not One Cent to Americans?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN MacCRATE,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. MacCRATE. Mr. Speaker, the railroad bill as passed by Congress carries within its confines two sections which foretell the ultimate destruction of all our past conceptions of the leadership which should exist between each railroad and the Nation. After the enactment of this bill into law the railroads of the country will be considered as parts of one entire system, rather than as individual units, and the commerce of the United States as a whole will dictate the rates and regulations for each mile of transportation. Hereafter we shall speak of the "trustees" rather than of the "owners" of the railroads. At last we have laid the foundations for an efficient transportation system for the United States of America.

By section 407 the Commerce Commission is directed—

To prepare and adopt a plan for the consolidation of the railway properties of the continental United States into a limited number of systems—

And in section 422 it is provided:

Inasmuch as it is impossible, without regulation and control in the interest of the commerce of the United States considered as a whole, to establish uniform rates, etc., * * * it is hereby declared that any carrier which receives an income in excess of a fair return shall hold such part of the excess as a trustee for and shall pay it to the United States.

There is no comfort in these provisions for defenders of the old order of railroad operation. They foretell a day when every track of American railroad will be included in one great consolidated system, operated by "trustees" for the people of the United States. For the present, we have determined that the trusteeship shall be limited and that existing systems may continue. The bitterest language in the debate on this bill was directed against the section providing for the division of income in excess of 6 per cent between the railroads and the United States. Men have declared such division constitutes confiscation and is unconstitutional, but these men are thinking in terms of yesterday, for we are facing the day when railroad owners will hold not only excess income but every act they perform shall be performed by them as trustees of this Nation.

Members have cried out in horror because we have attempted to guarantee continued operation of all the railroads in order that the people in every part of the country may be served. It is the cheapest kind of claptrap to say that we have delivered the railroads over to the financial interests when every line of the bill requires the consent of the Commerce Commission before the railroads can borrow a dollar, issue a bond, make an agreement, change a rate, or build or abandon a mile of track. In one breath men declare we have given the railroads everything and in the next they declare it is a crime for the Government to take half of the income in excess of 6 per cent. When the country reads what has been said by the opponents of this legislation it will find that they made no real attempt to change the labor clauses or to keep the roads for two years or to keep them forever, but that there was a strong effort to keep any of the profits of the roads from going into the Treasury of the United States.

If the bill as passed was not the best that could have been framed, why did the opposition fail to submit another? After debate finished they alone had the right to move to send the bill back to committee and specify wherein the bill was objectionable and what they desired inserted in it. On a prior occasion a distinguished gentleman of the opposition opposed a bill and moved to send it back to committee, but his motion then contained an entirely new bill, which met his views. Why was not that course followed here? Why was the motion to recommit barren of all suggestion as to what should be done? Who can blame the country if it concludes that much of the opposition was pure political camouflage for use in the coming campaign, to mislead a multitude of groups of our citizenship, for whose aims and ideals the opposition will not and dare not place itself on record.

The opposition will ask support from American workingmen; but why, then, did they not attempt to meet their views? They will ask those who believe in further Federal operation and permanent Federal ownership to join them, but will they go before the country and dare say they stand for Government ownership or further Federal control? Let the men who labor and the men who honestly believe in Federal control or ownership read the speeches of the leaders of the opposition and learn the true reason for the refusal to support this bill.

The President has directed that the railroads shall be returned to their owners on March 1, 1920. Congress must, therefore, pass legislation to effect the return. The opposition say the roads should be returned; but, in spite of the fact that two years ago they took the railroads over into Federal control, they come to the time when the roads must be given back absolutely unprepared with a plan, abjectly confessing they have no solution for the first great problem of the period of reconstruction. They cry they can not support this bill because it is not perfect, thinking the strong-minded people of this country will be fooled by that cry. The American people are not looking for perfection on this earth, but they do expect an honest human effort to be made to solve the problems of this Nation. The country now has this bill before it and can determine whether it is an honest attempt to solve the transportation problem, and while considering the plan of this bill it will not fail to ask what completed plan did the opposition propose?

This Nation has loaned $9,000,000,000 to the Allies, and they have been told they need not pay the interest now due. Nevertheless, because we tell American railroad owners, who employ American workingmen and serve American farms and factories and promote American trade, that we will lend them less than one-twentieth of the loan to the Allies and charge them 6 per cent interest on the loan gentleman almost wept on the floor of Congress. Yet only a few days ago some of them urged that we should lend an additional $150,000,000 to European countries. The American people are sick of buncombe, and as long as we extend billions of dollars of credit and urge millions more to foreign nations they will rightly value the sincerity of tears shed because we lend a little to help keep the wheels of American life in motion. Shall we guarantee billions to others and refuse all guaranties to Americans?

The Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OSCAR E. KELLER,

OF MINNESOTA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, from the sentiment expressed by the Members of this House, the conference report on the railroad bill will, no doubt, be adopted. But, in my estimation, this bill does not properly and adequately dispose of the railroad question. There is only one solution of the problem, and that is Government ownership and Government management of this great public utility.

A thorough analysis of the conference report develops the fact that this bill does not return the railroads to private ownership in the true sense of the word. The enactment of this legislation as it is written is an indorsement of public ownership. The bill as it is presently composed is part public ownership and private ownership. It is public ownership in so far as the Public Treasury is called upon to supply all deficiencies in return below a certain per cent, to provide the revolving fund from which to draw for improvements and betterments, and so forth; but it is private ownership in that the management is vested in private individuals and the profits are utilized by private officials. Personally I have always maintained that the railroads should stay in the hands of the Government under the present control for a period of from two to five years, the Government to continue some fair return upon the investment, during which time it could be definitely ascertained to the satisfaction of all concerned whether public ownership and operation was the most efficient and economic method of conducting the affairs of this great public utility. If at the end of such a test it was found that the best interests of the country and the people had not been efficiently and economically administered, then the roads could be returned to their former owners. But if such a test proved successful, prompt action should be taken by the Government to acquire the properties upon a fair and impartial valuation by disinterested experts. I still maintain that the two years just passed was not a fair test of Government operation. Under the abnormal conditions existing because of the war, it was impossible to carry on this gigantic enterprise profitably. What reasons prompted the owners to practically demand that the Government take over the railroads at a time when the genius and efficiency of private managers had the opportunity to show itself? The outbreak of the war placed a tremendous load upon our transportation system and called for the maximum of efficiency and economy in the handling of the business. Private management failed absolutely during the crisis. It depended upon the coordination and cooperation effected by Government control and operation to save it from complete demoralization.

They were more than willing when the crisis was reached to unload their business onto the Government; but when the crisis had passed, the war over, and traffic returning to its peace-time basis, the owners immediately demanded the return of their properties heavily subsidized, with a guaranteed return for a long period, and also a demand that the Government reimburse them for improvements that had not been made and for equipment that had or had not been purchased. They demanded, and they received, the support of the Treasury of the United States to conduct their business. They will demand, and undoubtedly they will receive in the very near future, a substantial increase in freight rates, probably as high as 40 per cent, which, while not coming directly from the people, will come indirectly through the greatly increased cost of all the necessities of life.

The position I take in this railroad matter is this: That the railroads either be retained by the Government as at present for a period of from two to five years, or that they be returned entirely to private ownership with no subsidies, no revolving fund, no guaranteed return; in fact that they be returned under the conditions upon which they were taken over, the Government to pay whatever is owing them as the result of Government operation, and that the question of labor be left as it was before the Government assumed control. To comply with the wishes of the railroad executives, as far as dollars and cents are concerned, while denying the requests of labor, in which are involved human liberties and happiness, is tyranny of the worst sort. The method of handling labor disputes and grievances under Government control seemed to be very satisfactory. This system should have been continued by legislation in returning the railroads, or the labor question should have been left open, as it was when the railroads were taken over by the Government.

Too much stress can not be placed upon the fact that the common people are the losers under this plan to return the railroads. Congress will, by adopting this report, indorse the plan of taking something from one element of our population and giving it to another—the plan which has been followed by one of the great nations of the earth, and which has been universally condemned.

The transportation system should and must remain in the hands of the Government if the best interests of the people and the country are to be adequately, efficiently, and economically served and the future development and prosperity of the United States assured. There can be no half-and-half plan foisted on the people and on the country. It must be either one or the other—full Government control and operation or private control and operation with no financial aid from the Public Treasury; and if the latter plan is adopted by this Congress I feel reasonably certain that within a very short time those in charge of the railroads will again appeal to the Government to take over their properties to save them from utter destruction.

Veto Appeals Filed with President Wilson by Railroad Unions and the American Equity Society.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE BLACK,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 27, 1920.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, in reading the Washington papers to-day I read an article "Veto appeals filed. Railroad unions, farmers, and equity society petition Wilson." And reading further down in the article I read as follows:

Referring to the risks of crop failure taken by the farmers every year in order to feed the Nation, the American Equity Society declared that the outstanding debt against farm values was between six and seven billion dollars, with an interest charge of about $500,000 a year to the farmers. The Government, the equity society said, does not guarantee this charge.

Of course, it does not; neither does it guarantee any fixed returns to any railroad under the terms of the section in the railroad bill which prescribes a rule of rate making. But I submit that if the Government was assuming to fix the prices which the farmer should charge for his product, as it fixes the price which the railroads shall charge for their services, and prohibit him from getting more than the fixed price that we would owe him the duty to fix a price high enough which would enable the farmer, who honestly, efficiently, and economically manages his farm, to earn at least 5½ per cent on his investment. If we did not do it, there would go up a complaint, and justly so, from the farmers the like of which has never been heard in this country.

Ordinarily, the Government does not assume the authority to fix the price of the farmers' product, and I am not one who favors that it should do so. I do not believe the farmers favor it.

But during the war the Government deemed it wise to assume control over wheat and did fix the price.

In enacting that legislation did we say simply to the Food Administrator that you shall fix a just and reasonable price to the farmer for his wheat? Oh, no. That was what those who originally wrote the bill and others who advocated the legislation wanted to say, but the farmer demanded more. They demanded that the law should specifically set out what the minimum price of the wheat crop for 1918 should be and that for future years during the life of the bill the Government should guarantee to the farmer before planting his crop just what guaranteed price he should receive for his wheat. Let me quote the exact language of a part of section 14 of the food-control bill. Here it is:

The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat for the crop of 1918 shall be based upon No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent at not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary markets. This guaranty shall not be dependent upon the action of the President under the first part of this section but is hereby made absolute and shall be binding until May 1, 1919.

I supported that bill because I thought if we were going to assume the authority to fix the price of one of the farmer's great basic commodities that we owed him a corresponding duty to make certain what his minimum price should be and not leave it to the caprices of administrative officials.

After the war was over I voted in favor of an appropriation of $1,000,000,000 to make that guaranty good, because I thought that good faith with the farmers demanded that it should be done.

On account of the high prices which have prevailed for wheat and its products, it is very likely that the Government will not lose anything on that billion-dollar wheat guaranty, and probably most of it will be returned to the Treasury, but we have demonstrated our entire willingness to observe good faith with the farmers by making the appropriation.

Now, in the railroad legislation about which this American Equity Society, which pretends to represent the farmers, are complaining so much, there is not a word which commits this Government to any guaranty after six months from March 1, 1920. The rate-making section is not a guaranty at all.

ANOTHER PARALLEL.

Another parallel which I want to draw between the rule of rate making in the railroad bill and the price-fixing provision for wheat in the food-control bill is this: When the President came to fix the minimum price for the 1919 crop it was contended by some of those who represented city consumers that $2 or even less would be an ample price to insure the farmer a profitable and safe return.

The farmers were forced to admit, in arguing the matter before the price-fixing committee, that there were some sections of the country where the land was fertile and the seasons regular and the yield abundant where the wheat grower could make a profit on even $1.75 wheat, but that the Government having assumed the arbitrary authority to fix the prices of wheat, that it therefore owed the farmer a duty to fix a price high enough to yield a fair margin of profit not only to the wheat grower who had his granaries in rich and fertile valleys but to the farmer who had pitched his crops on the frontier in the borderland between the valley and the desert.

Of course, this kind of a procedure had the effect to make some very rich earnings for the farmer who was especially well situated as to fertile lands and regular seasons, but the Government did not have any recapture clause in the food-control bill to recapture a part of the excess earnings which perchance might be made by any individual farmer.

It is different in the railroad bill. It does contain a recapture clause of one-half per cent of earnings in excess of 6 per cent made by the roads which are especially well located to be placed in a contingent fund to be used for the public interest.

GOVERNMENT DOES NOT GUARANTEE THE FARMER AGAINST CROP FAILURE.

These gentlemen of the American Equity Society say that "the Government does not guarantee the farmer against crop failure." No. Neither does the railroad bill guarantee any railroad against failure of traffic. Suppose a rate for any given territory is fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, so as to raise as nearly as may be 5½ per cent on the aggregate value of the railroads within that rate territory.

Here, for example, is a railroad within that territory which runs through a farming section and depends principally upon farm traffic for its revenue. Suppose there is a disastrous failure of crops in that territory. Is there anything in the bill which guarantees the railroad in any sort of way against the loss of that traffic. No; not a single word. The railroad gets no more guarantee against such a loss as that than a farmer gets against a crop failure. The railroad simply collects the freight rates in that given territory on whatever tonnage it does haul, just as the farmer would sell his few bushels of wheat that he might raise in such year of crop failure at the price which the Government had guaranteed. Both might lose on the year's operations. There is absolutely no difference in the two situations and no gentleman in this House or elsewhere gets anywhere by trying to befog the issue with such arguments as have been used in this memorial to the President.

The Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ISRAEL M. FOSTER,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

On the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that the vote on this conference report is in reality a test vote between Government ownership and private control. I supported the "Anderson amendment" when the Esch bill passed the House. Although the opposition to this bill had the opportunity to-day to present a motion to recommit, with instruction to substitute the "Anderson amendment" for the present "labor" clause therein, yet this opportunity has been disregarded, and the one "motion to recommit" has been intrusted to the gentleman from Kentucky, who did not support the Anderson amendment when the Esch bill was before the House. I am perfectly willing to concede that those supporting each side of this conference report are perfectly honest in their conviction. No bill of this importance can meet all the desires of everyone. There are several changes which, personally, I would like to see made, but after deliberate consideration, and consultation, and reflection I have reached the conclusion that, with the railroads being returned by the President to private ownership on March 1, the best thing for the welfare of all concerned is to support the conference report, which I shall do. I am not unmindful of the presence in my district of the many members of organized labor, such as the United Mine Workers and Railroad Brotherhoods and others. I have tried to give, and have given, respectful consideration to their petitions and requests. Most of them, I believe, will favor this bill.

On Thursday, February 19, 1920, I attended the conference called by the Railroad Brotherhoods to consider their protests against the adoption of this conference report. Just prior to that conference each Member of Congress received a circular letter, dated February 17, from the heads of several of the brotherhoods, reciting reasons why the conference report should be defeated. The eighteenth reason recited therein contained this language:

* * * Coal alone costs the railroads $400,000,000 a year. The railroads will not electrify the lines. It will destroy the best market for coal which railroad operators themselves own. It will cut into their profits as coal operators. The United States will only electrify the lines by Government action.

At Thursday night's conference I directed the attention of Mr. Timothy Shea, acting president of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, to this paragraph of their circular. I then suggested that the United Mine Workers of the tenth congressional district of Ohio were justly complaining because of loss of work part of the year, due, in the main, to a shortage in the coal market, and that it was rather unfair to the United Mine Workers for the railroad brotherhoods to take a stand in favor of electrifying all the railroad systems of America, and thereby remove a market for $400,000,000 worth of coal per year. I hope my calling the attention of both Mr. Shea and the other representatives of the brotherhood who were present to this suggestion to remove one-fourth of the present coal market might tend at least to remove this plank from their platform. No one assigned any reason why it was necessary to insist on electrifying the railroads and thus do away with an enormous coal market in order to safeguard the railroads while being turned over to private ownership. While these observations may not have an immediate bearing on the merits of the present conference report on the railroad bill, yet it is an outgrowth of this contest and has such a far-reaching effect on the output of over 300 coal mines in the tenth Ohio congressional district that I think it both advisable and expedient that it be given thoughtful consideration.

Some misconception prevails as to what has been improperly termed the "guaranty" feature of this bill. It has been erroneously asserted that this bill takes the earnings exceeding 6 per cent from the "well-managed" railroads and gives it to the "poorly managed" railroads. The fact is that the railroad which earns in excess of 6 per cent retains one-half of such excess, the remaining one-half of such excess becoming the property of the United States Government, and by it loaned, at 6 per cent interest, to the poorer railroads which may need assistance. I submit that this is quite different from the claim that the Government takes all of the excess from the one and gives it to the other. We have 250,000 miles of railroad in the United States. We are told that it requires $6,000,000,000 to rehabilitate them. This is equal to one-half of all the mortgaged indebtedness on all of our railroads. If the railroads can not be rehabilitated, they of necessity must go into bankruptcy. If we contemplate their going into bankruptcy, we must not forget that 25 per cent of all railroad bonds are owned by our insurance companies and savings banks; in other words, the average citizen who is carrying life insurance for the protection of his family has his money invested in the very securities which will be destroyed by such bankruptcy.

We are told that the railroads have cost our Government $1,000,000 for every day they have been under Government operation, despite the fact that while under Government operation they have received the benefit of a 50 per cent raise in passenger rates and a 25 per cent raise in freight rates. With this condition confronting us, I hesitate at this time to concur with those who advocate Government ownership of railroads. In any event, with the President's declaration in effect returning the roads on March 1, the main question before us now is what conditions shall surround them on their return in order to prevent a breakdown to our transportation systems. It is a very poor time for any of us to play politics. I propose to vote just as though my vote determined the future of this question. I believe that should be the test of every Member. If we do not adopt this conference report and vote for a "general motion to recommit," we are told by those who, by experience, should know that it actually means a return of the railroads to private ownership without any safeguards or protection until they can "get on their feet" and become established. This bill not only provides for assistance to those roads needing such assistance during a two-year period, but it also guarantees a preservation of the present wage scale of the employees.

So that there may be no misunderstanding as to the labor clause in this bill, I wish to quote from its provisions to show what elements are to be considered in determining wages thereunder:

In determining the justness and reasonableness of such wages and salaries or working conditions the board shall, so far as applicable, take into consideration among other relevant circumstances:
1. The scale of wages paid for similar kinds of work in other industries.
2. The relation between wages and the cost of living.
3. The hazards of the employment.
4. The training and skill required.
5. The degree of responsibility.
6. The character and regularity of the employment.
7. Inequalities of increases in wages or of treatment, the result of previous orders or adjustments.

I submit that these provisions, if carried out as I believe they will be, ought to insure fair treatment to labor. I surely hope it receives such fair treatment, and did I not believe it would I would hesitate in supporting this conference report.

Another thing that operates on my mind in causing me to reach a conclusion to support this bill in its present form is personal to my congressional district. We have many coal mines, many factories, and many small farms, and the railroads that penetrate our district are what might fairly be called the "weaker roads." In my judgment, the best interests of the miners and operators, manufacturers, farmers, and others will be served by the enactment of a law which will keep these so-called poorer railroads financed and in operation during the next two years while our country is going through the uncertainties attending our reconstruction. I believe our congressional district is not alone in this respect, and the safeguards contained in this bill will preserve the credit and keep from bankruptcy these weaker roads during the two-year period immediately following their return by the President to private ownership.

For nine months our railroad experts in both the Senate and House of Representatives have labored, almost day and night, in trying to secure the best possible laws under which these railroads might be returned to private ownership. We now have before us the product of those nine months' labor. To defeat it and allow the railroads to return to private ownership within 10 days, without any safeguards as to either labor or capital, would in my judgment be folly.

Therefore, while there are several features which I should personally wish to see changed, including the labor clause, yet I am compelled to choose between the support of this bill or allowing the railroads to return with every prospect of bankruptcy ahead. After the best thought I can give the matter I have reached the firm conviction that the best interests of the tenth congressional district of Ohio, as well as the best interests of the country, will be served by the passage of the bill and I shall vote accordingly.

This bill need not be the final word on railroad legislation. Where it is proven to be unworkable it can be modified. Any element that may develop by experience to be unjust to either employer, employee, or the public can be modified. I shall feel free at all times to vote for any modification of its provisions which may seem to be in the best interests of all parties concerned, but as it now stands I have the choice between this bill, calculated to safeguard the railroads on their return, or to invite bankruptcy with Government ownership as the final goal, toward which such chaos must inevitably tend. Therefore I shall support the bill. To vote otherwise would be to vote against my best judgment, honestly arrived at after painstaking consideration.

The Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. EVANS,

OF MONTANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920,

On the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, on so important a question as this bill I regret to find myself out of accord with what appears to be a majority of the Members of this House. I can not find it consistent with my present views to vote for this measure. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me to be unfortunate that this matter now comes before the House only a week before the day set for the return of the railroads to private ownership, and we find ourselves in the parliamentary situation that will not allow us to change or amend this bill. We must either vote for this conference report and thereby pass this bill, or vote against the conference report and thereby defeat the bill. I have great respect for the members of the committee who brought in this bill; great respect for the conferees who have agreed to this conference report, but I know of no guide for the performance of duty, either public or private, except a man's conscience, and, believing as I do that this measure is unjust to the American people and that it sets up and creates a favored class of investors and guarantees a fixed return upon capital invested in one particular and special line of industry, I can not under such circumstances bring myself to the belief that I am faithful to my country and to the oath of office I took if I vote for this measure.

There are some features of the bill—in fact, many features—which I should like to support. But under the circumstances I am compelled to reject them all or to sustain them all. I shall, therefore, vote against them.

The railroads were taken over by the Government for the conduct of a great war. It is not necessary to discuss the details of the policy or even the necessity which resulted in taking over these properties. When they were taken over the legislation provided that they should be returned to their owners within a certain period after the war. Twelve months ago the President of the United States in a message to Congress advised us that under the enactment we had made he would return the roads on January 1, 1920, and urged that necessary legislation be enacted for the future ownership, control, or supervision of these properties. When the date for the return of these roads approached and the necessary legislation had not been enacted, the President, by proclamation, fixed March 1 of this year as the date upon which the roads would be returned, thus giving Congress an additional 60 days' time in which to perform a duty that should have been completed months ago. We are now, therefore, confronted with a situation where we are compelled to enact this bill or allow the roads to be returned to their owners without any supervision over them other than exercised when we took the roads at the beginning of the war. If Congress finds it is in an embarrassing position, if it finds it is in a position that it must return the roads without additional control or supervision, or it must enact this bill, which, in my judgment, does violence to the rights of 110,000,000 people, Congress has nobody to blame but itself for its failure in the consideration and enactment of legislation of such vital importance.

We took over the roads and operated them during the war. We agreed to pay and did pay a sum equal to their average income for three years preceding the war, and we agreed to return the roads in practically the same condition as we took them. In order that these agreements might be faithfully kept we have taxed the American people more than $800,000,000. This money has been paid out of the National Treasury. It will be wiped off the books as a war loss. That water has now gone over the wheel.

My particular objection and complaint to the bill is that it is in effect a guaranty of 5½ to 6 per cent upon the investment of these properties. In order that we may understand just what this provision does for the railroads and to the people, let me state it in a few sentences. It directs the commission to "initiate, modify, establish, or adjust" rates so that carriers, as a whole, will earn an aggregate annual net income equal to a "fair" return upon the aggregate value of the railway property of such carriers held for and used in the service of transportation, and then follows a provision which declares that for the next two years this "fair" return shall be fixed at 5½ per cent plus an additional one-half of 1 per cent for betterments and improvements, which makes a total of 6 per cent net that the bill instructs the commission to produce on the aggregate value of all the property of all the railroads in the country. It then provides that if any road shall make more than 6 per cent under the rates fixed by the commission, one-half of the excess shall be set apart in a fund to be used by the roads in making improvements and betterments chargeable to capital account and the other one-half shall be paid to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the creation of a "revolving" fund to be used in making loans to other railroads or in purchasing equipment, such as cars, engines, and other equipment to be leased to them.

If this provision of the bill goes into effect, the Congress puts its stamp of approval on improvidence, negligence, and inefficiency. There will no longer be a reward for energy, initiative, frugality, and efficiency. I can not support a measure which compels the people of the Nation to pay tribute to inefficiency and extravagance in order that those who do not deserve it may get 6 per cent or any other established return. I can not bring myself to believe that any measure that insures one class of our people against failure in business by levying tribute on another class is good legislation.

This bill provides that if any railroad shall make more than 6 per cent on rates which have been declared to be legal, just, and reasonable, one-half of the excess of said 6 per cent shall be taken from it and used to create a fund to be used for the benefit of other roads. In other words, when the Interstate Commerce Commission has fixed a rate that under the law is just and reasonable, and any road through honesty, energy, and economy and efficiency and good management makes more than 6 per cent, it is to be penalized because of its honesty, efficiency, and good management, and one-half of the said excess is to be turned over to those roads whose management is negligent, inefficient, and possibly dishonest, or are for some other reason a financial failure. Such legislation is a departure from all the precedents of the Government.

I will not at length discuss the question of its constitutionality. I prefer to leave it to men better qualified than myself, but it appears to me that we are going far afield when we establish such a precedent. Permit me to make just one observation on the constitutionality of this provision of the law. We all know there is a provision in the fundamental law of the land which provides that property shall not be taken from its owner except by due process of law and for just compensation.

Let us see how this legislation will operate to do violence to the rights of property. In order that this average of 6 per cent net may be guaranteed to all the railroads, it will be admittedly necessary for those who live along or patronize well-managed, successful, and honest roads to pay more than the service they receive is worth, more than the roads themselves may ask for or need, in order that a fund may be created which is to be used for the benefit of others. Therefore, if these well-managed and successful roads, under lawful rates which must in theory, at least, be "just and reasonable," are able by the exercise of economy and prudent business management to earn more than 6 per cent net, under the law and under the guaranties provided in the Constitution, it belongs to them. If the rate is lawful, if it is approved by the commission as just and reasonable, it is entitled to earn all it can under that rate, and the road is entitled to keep it as its reward for efficiency and economy.

We have no legal right to take away from them what they have saved honestly through efficient management in order to bolster up the credit of weak, mismanaged, or inefficient railroads. And if, upon the theory that the particular road is earning more than it is entitled to, we have a right to take away a part of its earnings, certainly we have no right, in the first place, to take it away from the people who pay it. For if a railroad earns more than it is entitled to earn or retain, it is because it is permitted or compelled to collect from the people an unreasonable rate which results in the excess, and if the people are paying an unreasonable rate to one road in order that some other road somewhere else may be helped, we are taking away from them a part of their property without due process of law and without compensation. This, in my opinion, renders the law doubly unconstitutional. If the rates which the railroads collect are lawful rates, are just and reasonable for the service rendered, the road is entitled to the earnings it may be able to realize from them.

If they collect, even with the permission of the commission, or under its compulsion, rates which are more than reasonable, and therefore unreasonable and unlawful, the excess belongs to the people, and they are entitled to retain what is theirs until it is taken away from them in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. And if this provision for taking a part of the excess shall be declared unconstitutional and many roads are allowed or compelled to collect rates higher than they are entitled to, the result will be the taking from the people of hundreds of millions of dollars in excessive freight rates without even receiving an indirect benefit from the excess payment.

PRESENT VALUE.

Again if 5½ or 6 per cent, or any other per cent, is to be guaranteed as the earnings upon the valuation of the roads, it is necessary to ascertain the value of the roads. Who to-day can say what the value of any given road is? Who has figures which we can use to do it? Are we to take the book value as shown by the roads themselves? Are we to take the estimate that some engineer will give us as to what it will cost to reproduce the road, or shall we wait until the Interstate Commerce Commission completes its work of appraising the physical value of these properties? It is a well-known fact that it will take some years to complete that work. One of the leading railroad officials of the United States estimated the total value of the railroad properties of the United States at $24,000,000,000. The Interstate Commerce Commission report estimates the capitalization of these properties at about $19,000,000,000, and this same report estimates the actual investment of these properties at a little more than $18,000,000,000. One can get as many estimates of the value of these properties as people with whom he talks upon the subject. Who, then, is to make the estimate upon which the American people are to guarantee a return of 6 per cent? Whose figures are to be used as a basis upon which this tribute is to be exacted from the people of the country?

The absurdity of fastening upon the country this guaranty upon the valuation of these properties that can only be guessed at is so obvious that it is inconceivable that it should be seriously considered by an American Congress. Not only that, it is a guaranty against failure. It is an attempt at legislative favoritism never before practiced in the history of this country. As above stated, it penalizes thrift, energy, efficiency, and ambition on the one hand and it removes the initiative for all these things on the other. It takes away the hope of reward for work well done. It pays tribute to improvidence. It attempts to insure one class of investments against risks and hazards of business, leaving all others to battle against the handicaps that besiege us in all our undertakings. Such a scheme was never before proposed in a legislative body in the history of the world. By what line of reasoning can we justify ourselves when we attempt to guarantee one branch of industry, one kind of business, one kind of security, against failure while we leave all others to battle for themselves? The merchant takes his chances, the professional man accepts the hazards and uncertainty of his profession, the manufacturer risks his judgment, the farmer contends with the elements and the soil and assumes the risks and hazards and the vicissitudes that surround him. None of these have any guaranty from the Government; they never had and they never will. Is it fair to them, is it fair to all those who work and toil and save, and who ask the Government for nothing but to be allowed to pursue their business unrestricted and without interference? Is it fair, I say, to them to guarantee the returns upon the stocks and securities of the railroad owners and the railroad investors under the circumstances as provided in this bill?

NOT OPPOSED TO RAILROADS.

I hope that what I have said will not be construed to mean that I am opposed to the railroads. Such is not the case. The railroads should be dealt with fairly, justly, and equitably. I am willing that they be dealt with liberally. I want them to succeed. I want everybody to succeed. I hope they may pay dividends and that the owners and stockholders will get a fair return upon their investment. If they succeed generally other business men and the country itself will prosper and succeed. But I am not willing to guarantee success to the owners or stockholders of the railroads, for the simple reason that we can not guarantee success to men engaged in any other line of industry, business, and investment.

I know it is said that this is not a guaranty, and that this money will not come out of the Treasury of the United States. On the first proposition it may not be a guaranty in name, but it is a guaranty in effect. On the second proposition the money may not come out of the Treasury of the United States, but it comes out of the pockets of the people of the United States. Call it a guaranty or call it what you will, the bill provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall fix a rate for freight and passenger traffic that will allow the roads to earn a fair return upon their capital. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that a fair return is 6 per cent. It must therefore necessarily follow that the Interstate Commerce Commission will fix a rate for traffic over these properties that will guarantee them 6 per cent. Therefore when men say that this is not a guaranty they are simply juggling with words.

Mr. Speaker, there never was a time in the history of the country that every railroad made money; that every investment in railroad securities, stocks, and bonds realized a profit. Probably some of the time all of the railroads made money. Probably at some time all the roads incurred a deficit. Some of the investors in stocks and bonds have made large profits and at times some of them have suffered losses. Investments in these securities and properties, like investors in every other kind of business, have taken their chances of gain or loss. I dare say there has never been a day in the history of railroading in this country when some of these properties were not running behind and probably in the hands of a receiver. But when this report is adopted and when this law goes upon the statute books, for the first time in the history of any government on earth the Government itself says to the people you must pay such a rate to your transportation companies for your business over them that will bring to the said companies a fair return upon their investments, which the Supreme Court of the United States says is at least 6 per cent. You may call it a guaranty or call it what you please.

The advocates of this report hold up to this House a bugaboo of bankruptcy on the one hand and Government ownership on the other. They say if this bill is not promptly passed with all its defects that on the 1st of March or a few weeks or months thereafter these roads will all be in bankruptcy, and that in the end the Government will be compelled to take them over with an investment of eighteen to twenty-five billion dollars.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP.

Mr. Speaker, it is my personal opinion that worse things could happen to this country than Government ownership, and one of those things is to leave a perpetual burden upon the people of this country to guarantee a return of 6 per cent upon these properties. I am not afraid of bankruptcy of these properties, nor am I afraid for the Government to take these properties, own them, and operate them. Much has been said upon the floor of this House that the operation of these properties by the Government during the war was a failure. I challenge that statement. They say it has cost the Government a million dollars a day to operate these roads, and that they have run behind approximately a billion dollars. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that it has cost the Government large sums of money, possibly a million dollars a day, possibly a billion dollars in the aggregate, for the operation of the railroads during the war, and I think it should be charged off as a war loss. I think it will not be recovered, but it was a war necessity, and we will recover just as much of the money we spent as a war necessity in the operation of the railroads as we will of the money we spent as a war necessity for ships, for cannons, for ammunition, for powder, for uniforms for soldiers, for poisonous gasses, and for the hundreds of other things for which we spent money to carry on a great war. Of course, it costs money to run a railroad during a war period.

The roads were run during that period not for the benefit of the roads but for the benefit of the Government. Thirteen millions of soldiers, seamen, and marines were transported by railroads for which the Government paid the railroads only one-third of what would have been charged for the transportation of an equal number of civilians. Priority orders were issued and millions of tons of freight which would have brought the railroads a handsome figure were set aside in order that the troops and munitions of war might have the preference over these roads. The railroads were operated under the pressure of war conditions. The question of destruction of cars, engines, roadbeds, and bridges were not considered in the great rush to put our men, munitions, and supplies to the front. Of course, it cost money to operate the roads under such unusual circumstances.

But I say without fear of successful contradiction that for the same service rendered under the same conditions it would cost the Government no more than it would had they been run under private management. In a recent discussion of this very question Director General Hines is quoted in the press as having made the following statement:

Had the railroads proceeded during the war under private control they would have been subject to just as heavy increases in operating expenses as the Government encountered—perhaps heavier, for they would not have been able to offset many economies possible under a central administration.

If the Railroad Administration had been able to raise its prices as quickly as other industries did to meet the rapidly advancing costs, there would have been no loss, but an actual profit, in operation of the roads for the first year and ten months of Government control. There would have been no deficit until October, 1919, and succeeding months, when bad weather, the coal strike, and the steel strike created abnormal conditions.

Government ownership of railroads may not be desirable, but I am myself not prepared to say that Government ownership is a failure because of the experience of the operation of the railroads during the past two years. The two-year operation under such abnormal conditions was by no means a fair test. Men who insist that the Government can not successfully operate its railroads should furnish better evidence than the fact that it cost the Government a large sum of money to operate its roads during the war period. And I venture the opinion that those who are so frightened about the question of Government ownership and are voting for this bill fastening a burden upon the people to guarantee a return upon slothfulness, inefficiency, and mismanagement are hastening the day when they will be face to face with Government ownership of the railroads.

GOVERNMENT SPENT MILLIONS BENEFITING ROADS.

Mr. Speaker, it is contended by some of the Members in favor of this bill that the owners of the railroads made a big sacrifice to the Government in time of need. Was that the situation? It is a well-known fact that the roads were taken over by the Government only after conference with the railroad officials. They knew they could not stand the burden of the Great War and sell their bonds when the Government was selling bonds for carrying on the Great War. They knew their finances would soon be depleted and they would be threatened with bankruptcy, as many of them were. They knew that the Government would take hold of the roads, improve them, spend millions on their upkeep, and then return them to their owners. They knew they could not make big profits during this period, but that they could exact from the American Government and its people a handsome profit without any hazards.

When the Government took the roads for war purposes steps were immediately taken to place the needed finances to their credit. Insolvent roads were advanced money to keep them operating successfully. Roundhouses and repair shops were built. Equipment, rolling stock, and other necessary improvements were provided as war necessities. To be accurate, $1,000,000,000 was given for improvements and equipment and a rental of $2,000,000,000 net profit was paid for the use of the roads. Hundreds of formerly sound business enterprises failed during the war by reason of the stress. But the railroad industry was stabilized, placed on a sound operating basis, profits guaranteed, and hundreds of unnecessary offices abolished. The cry that bankruptcy was bound to follow under the great pressure was heard, and the Government came to their relief.

Now, shall we with a realization of all this listen to another cry of bankruptcy if we do not guarantee set profits? Shall we at the expense of the taxpayer, the shipper, the merchant, and the consumer guarantee the railroads that we will make up any deficit they may have from time to time by simply having them come to the Interstate Commerce Commission and letting us know?

It is again asserted by some that the defeat of this measure will mean the ruin of the roads, result in Government ownership, and chaos through the country. Should we not approve this bill, the roads will immediately go back to the owners, without any of the entangling guaranties of financial assistance in the form of a continuous burden on the people. Without these assurances, the roads would go to work, get on a sound businesslike working basis, cut down their personal and overhead expenses, curtail where they can, eliminate the high-salaried officers when advisable, and in a short time, I dare say, have paid back their great indebtedness now existing.

ECONOMY.

For weeks the song of economy has been heard in the Halls of this House. It is economy here and economy there. The reclamation projects of the great West are to starve to death because we have no money. The service of the great Agricultural Department is to be cut to the quick. The diplomatic bill must be cut in two. The fees for grazing on the forest reserves in the mountain States must be raised 300 per cent to get $5,000,000 to help save the Government. The public domain in all the public-land States is to be withdrawn and put in grazing reserves, with the hope of getting a few million more. Millions must be cut from the soldiers' rehabilitation bill. All public building must stop. The steering committee decrees there shall be no public-buildings bill this Congress; and so it goes all along the line. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, only yesterday there came into this House the legislative bill with a provision for the abolishment of some of the assay offices in the great mining States, and in support of such a proposition it is argued that the abandonment of these facilities, which mean so much to the mining industry, will save the Government the magnificent sum of $15,000 a year. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, this same bill, and for the same reason and supported by the same argument, abolishes the offices of surveyor general in all the public-land States—13 in number—because, as the report of the committee says, it will redound to our policy of economy to the extent of $39,000 a year. And yet in the face of these facts we are advised that the people and the Government are so rich and so generous that we can contribute $1,000,000,000 to security holders of the railroads, in addition to the $1,000,000,000 advanced for betterment and equipment, to say nothing of the $2,000,000,000 net profits paid them during the war period, when if left to their own resources they would probably have gone into bankruptcy.

Mr. Speaker, in the name of the American people I protest against the passage of this bill.

The Late J. Willard Ragsdale.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, January 25, 1920.

The House had under consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. J. WILLARD RAGSDALE, late a Member of this House from the State of South Carolina.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of this day, shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, as I have listened to my friends pay tribute to the life and character of our deceased colleague and friend I have become greatly depressed. I recall that when I came to the House in 1911 I found constituting the South Carolina delegation Messrs. Legare, Ellerbe, Aiken, Lever, Johnson, and Finley. Of these six men, all young, four have passed away. Our beloved friend George Legare was first claimed by death. Later, Ellerbe, who loved Legare as few men love each other in this life, was called to his reward. Judge Finley, who for 18 years had served as a Member of this House, died while still in service. Judge Johnson, a few years after he left this body, passed away. I might also say that in the other body Senator Tillman, only a short while ago, after a service long and distinguished, was claimed by death, and one year after his death, in July, 1919, he was followed by a man who always loved him and was one of his stanchest political supporters, J. WILLARD RAGSDALE.

I doubt if in the House there is another State delegation in which there is more geniality and more true comradeship than in the delegation of the State of South Carolina, and I say this, notwithstanding the fact that I know how closely men are drawn together when they come from States far distant. It is not surprising that this comradeship exists, for when human beings come to know each other they generally come to entertain for each other a more genuine affection. This certainly has been the rule in our delegation, and therefore you can appreciate how shocked and grieved we were to learn of the sudden death of WILLARD RAGSDALE. To me it was especially shocking, for during the two or three days preceding his death I had spent much time with him. I knew that he was not a well man. He told me he was consulting a physician, but I little dreamed, and he little dreamed, that he was so near to death.

I knew him, Mr. Speaker, before I came to the House, but I was not as intimately acquainted with him then as I afterwards became. I knew, however, that he was what we generally call a self-made man. He was born at Timmonsville, Florence County, S. C. After attending the schools of the little city of Timmonsville and the school at Darlington, where he resided for a short time, he went to Wilmington, N. C., where he spent a few years, and his first employment in life was there with the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad. Leaving there, he returned to South Carolina, attended the University of our State, studying law under Pope, whose reputation extends beyond the borders of South Carolina. Admitted to the bar, his success as a young lawyer was phenomenal. Those of us who knew him can understand it. RAGSDALE was a great jury lawyer. He quickly became recognized as one of the best criminal lawyers in the eastern part of the State, and there was hardly a case of any importance in which he was not employed either as counsel for the defendant or assisting the solicitor in the prosecution.

In addressing a jury he was effective, because RAGSDALE knew men. As a master who plays upon the strings of a musical instrument, he could play upon the feelings and upon the prejudices of a jury or of an audience.

He was a most effective stump speaker. As an illustration of his effectiveness as a stump speaker—I saw and heard him in Philadelphia in the last national campaign. He told me he was going to speak at a monster meeting in the opera house. I went to hear him, and I found that I was correct in believing that RAGSDALE knew men, for here, addressing men whom he had never seen before and with whom he had never been associated, with his fiery eloquence and his knowledge of human nature he soon had the audience applauding and yelling for him. I understood then as I listened to him how successful he was as a stump speaker in his own district.

Possessing this gift, and possessing, too, his unlimited energy and his love of excitement and adventure, it was only natural that he early entered politics. He was elected to the legislature and served two years in the house. He was then elected to the senate, and after serving one term he became a candidate for the office of attorney general. In that contest he was defeated. But, though defeated, he won for himself throughout the entire State of South Carolina friends who always remembered him and who always admired him. Two years later he became a candidate for Congress, opposing our former colleague, Mr. Ellerbe. He was defeated, but in the next contest he was successful, and he served here for three terms and was serving his fourth term when claimed by death.

During his first term here he was a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency. I saw him then exhibit a trait, referred to by my colleague, Mr. STEVENSON, a few moments ago, that convinced me that Mr. RAGSDALE could diagnose a situation much better than the average man. In the caucus upon the currency bill, where a number of us who were interested in securing the recognition of agricultural products as the basis for the rediscount privilege had been making an earnest fight for many days, RAGSDALE, with some of his friends, immediately assumed what we regarded as an extreme position.

Finally, after many days of debate and of contest in this House, when I offered to the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency a compromise, which was agreed to by the then chairman, Mr. GLASS, I went to my colleague, Mr. RAGSDALE, asking him to agree to my compromise and stop the fight upon the bill. I anticipated a very difficult time in persuading him; but, to my amazement, as soon as I presented the compromise, he said, "Why, I never had any idea of obtaining anything better, but only by assuming this attitude did I have any hope of securing a compromise." He had truly analyzed the situation and had pursued his course, regarded then by many as unwise, with the sole purpose of securing such a compromise as we did secure upon that question.

Later he served upon the committee having jurisdiction of the District of Columbia affairs, and then on the Committee on Foreign Affairs. In the House he was always forceful. As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has said "there was never any doubt of where RAGSDALE stood upon any question. He was a man of decided opinions, and he always expressed those opinions. He was fearless; he was independent. He often differed from his party associates here, but he always gave good reasons for doing so. Aggressive and forceful, it was remarkable that so fluent a speaker was so accurate a speaker. Time and again I have seen him turn in the manuscript of his remarks delivered upon the floor with the rapidity so characteristic of him without revising or changing a single word in the pages of manuscript.

Mr. Speaker, those who saw Mr. RAGSDALE only when he was engaged in some contest on this floor and who regarded his manner as stormy, can have no true conception of his kindly nature. Those of us who knew him intimately knew that while he was impulsive and quick-tempered, he was at the same time generous and forgiving. RAGSDALE was true to his friends, and it was doubtless this loyalty and sincerity that won for him the friendship of men who were true to him during his entire political career. In his home he was a devoted husband and a loving father. In early life, shortly after leaving college, he married Miss Louise Joynes, a daughter of Dr. Joynes, of South Carolina University. This union was blessed by two children, a son, James, who is now 18 years of age, and a daughter, Louise, now 14 years of age. I have never known a happier family. His was possibly the most hospitable home in congressional circles. He loved to have his friends around him, and his greatest pleasure was to bring happiness to them.

Reference has been made to his success in business. He was successful. He organized the Farmers and Merchants Bank of Florence, which he served as president for many years; he operated extensive farms, and even during his service in Congress here he practiced law at home. He made money, but he believed in spending money. He valued it only for the happiness it could bring to himself, his family, and his friends. He was as charitable as any other man in my acquaintance, and, as my colleague Mr. MANN has said, many young men in the State of South Carolina to-day are prospering because they were the beneficiaries of his unselfishness.

No greater tribute to the life of a man can be asked than the love of the people among whom he lived. J. WILLARD RAGSDALE possessed that love, and no better evidence of this could have been asked than the gathering of thousands of his friends from all over the congressional district to pay tribute to his memory when his funeral services were held last July. They came from all walks of life, and the tears in the eyes of men, as well as of women, gave proof of the fact that they came not out of idle curiosity, but in order to pay tribute to a man whose memory they loved. His body rests in the little cemetery at Florence, in the soil of the State he loved so well, but his memory rests secure in the hearts of those whose good fortune it was to know him and to love him.

"Why Should the Public Sit In?"

The brotherhood of the general public does not maintain any lobby, but it shall nevertheless be represented in Congress.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM N. VAILE,

OF COLORADO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

On the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND], whom we all love and admire, has made a most shocking disclosure to us concerning the iniquities of the railroad bill regarding the settlement of labor disputes.

He says:

You have in this bill a provision that the public shall sit in all cases, and the public shall be one of the board making the decision.

He contends that this is grossly unfair to organized labor.

Until I heard my distinguished friend I had a lingering impression that I was here to protect the public, that I was to be an advocate of the public. Now he tells me that this is all wrong. As a Member of the House of Representatives, the body which is supposed to be the palladium of our liberties, close to the people and directly responsible to their will, he stands here and tells us that the bill is wrong, because it permits the public to "interfere between the men who work on the railroads and their employers."

The horror of this situation is increased, not diminished, by the fact that the only force behind such a decision is the force of public opinion. He reminds us that the decision, to which the consent of the public must be secured, "is not compulsory, but everyone knows that where a finding is made by a board of the character provided for, in which the railroads and the public agree, the majority of the board, it would be practically compulsory upon the men who work on the roads. There is no question about that. Everyone will agree to that."

Public opinion elected the gentleman from Pennsylvania to this House. He and I are answerable to it for our conduct here. But labor, according to the gentleman's argument, shall not be answerable to it. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] says that the compulsion of public opinion will drive me out of Congress, but, of course, it is to have no binding effect upon labor.

And if Congress should be misguided enough to give some voice to the public, that voice must not be heard in agreement with the employers but only in agreement with the employees. The only award which should be binding, even by moral suasion, is the award which labor may agree to. If the public agrees to it, the public shows a proper submissive spirit. If the public does not agree to it, then the public is simply out of luck.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is only human nature for all of us to consider principally our own individual interests. Capital does it and labor does it. For months the Washington hotels have swarmed with representatives of organized labor. They have been very active in visiting and interviewing Congressmen and they fill the galleries of the House whenever there is a discussion or a vote on matters affecting labor. It is just as legitimate for the railroad brotherhoods to keep a lobby here to advocate legislation which they desire, or to oppose legislation which they deem unfavorable to their best interests, as it is for the United States Chamber of Commerce to maintain its offices and agents here. It is perfectly proper for either a railroad attorney or a railroad brotherhood delegate to appear before congressional committees or to visit individual Congressmen for the purpose of arguing the cause of his clients.

But the great brotherhood of the general public does not maintain any lobby at Washington. I am, however, a member of it, and while I remain in Congress I shall represent it to the extent of my ability upon this floor. I am in favor of this bill, but not for the reason that it is opposed by organized labor. I hope the time will never come when my judgment shall be so obscured as to be in favor of any bill merely because it is opposed by somebody else. When I vote for a bill, as I vote for this one, it is because I am convinced of its merits. If Mr. Gompers were in favor of it I would welcome his support, but it would not increase my advocacy of this bill any more than his opposition shall drive me away.

Now, we are all members of the brotherhood of the general public, even though we may also be members of some other brotherhoods, and I believe that this brotherhood of the general public has been somewhat neglected in the past in controversies between labor and capital. The time is coming—in fact, the time has arrived—when this old good-natured, long-suffering brotherhood of the general public, which has been so much of an easy mark in the past, is going to be heard. When, for example, a railroad strike is threatened which would keep the coal from our factories, and the milk from our babies in the cities, and bring some measure of inconvenience and suffering to every man, woman, and child in the United States, the people of the United States are going henceforth to take a hand in the settlement of that dispute.

Ah, my friends of the railroad brotherhoods, it ought to be easy for you to see that your cause is so just that it need not fear the voice of public opinion. I concede that the Brotherhood of Railway Conductors, and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, and the International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers, and any other organization or group of employees should be represented in the settlement of a dispute between them and their employers, and this bill provides that they shall be. But I demand that the brotherhood of the general public should also "sit in." And it seems to me not unreasonable to insist that the decision which is made should be equitable enough and fair enough to be concurred in by at least one out of the public's three representatives.

That is all that this bill provides. There is no interference in it with "free speech" or "free assembly" or "collective bargaining." There is no attachment of union funds or of any property of a union or of any of its members. There is no judgment, civil or criminal, against a union or any union man. There is no penalty whatever for going on strike—that is, no penalty except the condemnation of public opinion. That is absolutely all there is to the so-called "antistrike" provisions of this bill.

A strike may be the only means of obtaining a worthy end. The same thing may be said of war. A war causes great suffering and loss, not only to the combatants but to noncombatants. The same thing is true of a strike. He who proposes either a war or a strike may have overwhelmingly the merits of the case. He also has the burden of proof. You should expect to be able to prove the justice of your strike, but if it is just you need not fear public opinion. If it is unjust you ought to fear it.

The great labor spokesman, Mr. John Mitchell, president of the United Mine Workers, in his book "Organized Labor," page 310, says that:

> In railroad and street railway strikes the greatest sufferers are the public, who are deprived of comforts or even of necessaries.

This bill simply means that these sufferers are going to have something to say.

You of the railroad brotherhoods have enjoyed the confidence of the public for a long time. I can not believe that you are unwilling now to submit your case to its judgment. I certainly do not fear that judgment in my own case.

Agreement to Conference Report of Railroad Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES G. STRONG,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state the conditions which now confront the Nation, affecting every line of business, including both capital and labor; and the reasons which, in the interest of the people of my district and the whole country, make it necessary that we should pass this bill.

The railroads were taken over by the Government as a war necessity, the agreement being made that a "standard return," or rental, would be paid to the owners, and that they would be returned when the war was over. The Government loss during the operation of the roads has been over $636,000,000; many millions have been expended in improvements which the roads are to repay when they are able. The present expenditures over receipts is between $1,000,000 and $2,000,000 per day.

When the President announced that the railroads would be returned on January 1, 1920, it became the duty of Congress to pass legislation which would provide for a settlement between the Government and the roads and would enable them to meet the present losses, finance their needs, and continue to give employment to the men and service to the people.

The special session of Congress was convened on May 19 to pass the appropriation bills which had failed in the prior session, and as soon as they were out of the way the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce began the consideration of railroad legislation and for nearly 10 weeks held hearings and secured expert testimony on every proposition which anyone cared to present; these included the Plumb plan, proposed by the heads of the labor unions; the Warfield plan, proposed by the security holders; the executive plan, proposed by the owners; the Interstate Commerce Commission plan, proposed by Government heads; and other propositions. These hearings were published in three large volumes and comprise 3,669 pages and constitute the most exact information on the subject ever collected in the world. It has been the duty of the committee to draft a bill which would include what they felt to be the best of all the plans proposed, avoiding what they believed to be objectionable. On November 8 the Esch bill, named after the chairman of the committee, was finished and reported to the House. It contained guaranties necessary to continue the standard return until such time as it was thought the owners could either reduce their expenses or increase incomes; it provided for many matters, such as rates, financing, regulations, and so forth, and included a labor section which, when changed by the Anderson amendment, was declared to be satisfactory by the labor leaders, and which passed the House on November 17. The Senate passed the Cummins bill a month later, and three days thereafter the two bills were sent to a conference composed of five of the most experienced members of the committees of each body which had prepared them, and whose duty it was to reach an agreement if possible. This conference committee met every day until February 19, when it reached a complete agreement and reported out the present bill. That it is the result of many compromises is, of course, true, nor can it be claimed that it is perfect. There are many features to which Members object, and there are those which I myself do not indorse; but it is the result of over seven months of close study by the most expert and experienced men of this Nation. I believe it to be a step forward in the better control and service by our transportation facilities so necessary to every farmer and business man, every factory and mine, and all labor. It provides for a settlement of accounts between the Government and the railroads; it stops the conflict of authority between State and Government regulation by giving full control to the Interstate Commerce Commission; it puts an end to watered-stock issues and railroad wrecking by giving the commission full power to authorize or refuse all issues of stocks or bonds, as well as to regulate railroad building, rates, service, and so forth. It provides for financing at a return to the Government at 6 per cent. It continues the same standard return provided in the Esch bill for a period of six months, during which time the wages now paid the men are not to be reduced. There is no further guaranty by the Government as alleged by those who oppose the bill. The rate-making section is not a guaranty. It merely directs the Interstate Commerce Commission that in so far as was practicable it should make rates that would yield "under honest, efficient, and economical management" earnings "equal to a fair return on the value of the railroad property," and that for two years 5½ per cent shall be taken as a fair return. Any establishment of rates, of course, will permit some roads to earn a large return, while small branch roads will earn less, and so the bill provides that of all profits earned over 6 per cent one-half shall be taken by the Government and placed in a fund to be used to assist the weaker roads, which is a provision that will be greatly appreciated both by the employees and the shippers on the many branch lines throughout the country.

The labor section is opposed by the labor leaders here in Washington, but after a careful study of its provisions I am unable to see wherein it is unfair to the employees. Having lost my father when a young man and inheriting no property, I have had to earn every dollar I possess or which has gone to the support of my family and the education of my children. I have always lived in a small town and have not even had a "speaking acquaintance" with capital, and my sympathies are always with those who must work for the needs of life. I have many railway employees in my district whose interests it is my duty to represent, compatible with the greater agricultural and business interests I am obligated to protect, and I would not knowingly do either an injustice, and I do not believe that this bill does so. Sections 301 and 302 simply provide that boards for labor adjustments may be established, and leaves it to the railroads and the employees to arrange between themselves as to how these boards may be formed and used, and provide that any carrier, or labor organization, or subordinate officials, or unorganized employees or officials to the number of 100 or more, may present their disputes to such boards. Section 304 to section 316 provide for the organization by the Government of a labor board, to which deadlocks and appeals from the adjustment boards may be taken. It is composed of nine members, paid by the Government, three members of whom are chosen from nominations made by the labor organizations, three from nominations made by the carriers, and three chosen by the President and confirmed by the Senate, who are to represent the public. No one is compelled to appeal to this board or to abide by its decision. It is not compulsory arbitration. The board has the right to make investigations on its own initiative, and has the power to procure evidence which, together with its decisions, when published, will leave to public opinion the condemnation of those who are at fault, recognizing that public opinion is our great governing force. Surely this is not unfair to labor, and I can not believe railroad employees can be induced to so misconstrue it.

Of course, the bill will be opposed by all those who favor Government ownership or an extension of Government control, but the people of my district, by a large majority, desire the railroads returned to their owners, and it is my duty to comply with their wishes, in which, for many reasons, I am in full accord.

To reject this conference bill would be to permit the return of the railroads on March 1, which is the time now set by the President, and which is but eight days away, without any provision for their maintenance or operation, which I believe would result in bringing about the financial and industrial crisis which we are endeavoring so earnestly to avoid. I would not share the responsibility which such action may involve. The people need, and must have, good, well-regulated transportation facilities, and I conscientiously believe this legislation will produce such results.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MILTON H. WELLING.

OF UTAH,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 2, 1920.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, availing myself of the right to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit the bill to establish the standard of the weights, measures, and coins of the United States.

Accompanying the bill is a statement of the details of the legislation and an analysis of the measure prepared by Mr. Samuel Russell, who has given much thought and study to this problem and is an earnest advocate of the proposed reform.

The bill and statement are as follows.

A bill (H. R. 12850) to establish the standard and decimal divisions of the weights, measures, and coins of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That the standard of the weights, measures, and coins of the United States, and the decimal divisions thereof, shall, after the 1st day of January, 1921, be as follows:

The standard for the measure of length shall be the foot as heretofore commonly used and established as a measure of length in the United States of America, and which is the standard foot of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

The decimal divisions of the foot shall be the tenth or decimal inch, the hundredth or line, and the thousandth or point, of which 10 points equal 1 line, 10 lines equal 1 decimal inch, and 10 decimal inches equal 1 foot. One hundred points equal 1 decimal inch, and 1,000 points equal 1 foot.

The common fractions of the foot shall be the half, third, quarter, and twelfth, of which the twelfth shall be denominated the common inch.

The common multiples of the foot shall be the yard, the fathom, the rod, the furlong, and the mile, of which the yard equals 3 feet, the fathom equals 6 feet, the rod equals 16½ feet, the furlong equals 40 rods and the mile equals 320 rods.

The standard for the measure of plane surfaces shall be the square of the foot, which shall be designated the square. The decimal division of the square shall be the square of the decimal inch, which shall be designated the decimal square, and of which 100 decimal squares equal 1 square.

The squares of the respective multiples and divisions of the foot may be used for the measurement of plane surfaces.

The standard for the measure of land surfaces shall be the acre of 160 square rods. The square furlong equals 10 acres. The acre-foot is the measure of water, having a surface of 1 acre and a depth of 1 foot.

The standard for the measure of volume shall be the cube of the foot, which shall be designated the cube. The decimal division of the cube shall be the cube of the decimal inch, which shall be designated the decimal cube, and of which 1,000 decimal cubes equal 1 cube.

The cubes of the respective multiples and divisions of the foot may be used for the measurement of volume.

The standard for the measurement of weight shall be the weight of the cube of water at maximum density, which shall be designated the weight unit. The decimal unit for the measurement of weight shall be the ounce, which shall be the weight of the decimal cube of water at maximum density. The decimal divisions of the ounce shall be the dram and the grain, of which 10 drams equal 1 ounce, 1,000 grains equal 1 ounce. One hundred grains equal 1 dram.

The multiples of the ounce shall be the decimal pound, the weight unit, the quarter, and the ton, of which 10 ounces equal 1 decimal pound, 100 decimal pounds equal 1 weight unit, 1,000 ounces equal 1 weight unit, 8 weight units equal 1 quarter, 4 quarters equal 1 ton.

Multiples of the decimal pound of 10 ounces may be used for measures of weight.

The avoirdupois or common pound equals 16 ounces; the ton equals 2,000 avoirdupois pounds.

The standard for the measure of liquids shall be the liquid ounce, which is equal to the decimal cube, and of which 10 liquid ounces equal 1 decimal pint, and 1,000 liquid ounces equal 1 liquid cube.

Multiples of the decimal pint of 10 decimal cubes may be used for liquid or dry measure.

The standard for the measure of dry commodities shall be the cube measure, which is the cube of the foot. The common divisions of the cube for dry measure shall be the quart, the pot, the gallon, the peck, and the half cube, of which 2 quarts equal 1 pot, 2 pots equal 1 gallon, 2 gallons equal 1 peck, 2 pecks equal 1 half cube, 2 half cubes equal 1 cube.

The bushel shall be equal to 1,250 decimal cubes. The bushel is equal to 5 pecks, 10 gallons, 20 pots, or 40 quarts.

The water-flow unit shall be the flow of 1 cube of water in one second of time.

The mechanical-power unit shall be the quantity of power required to raise 1 weight unit 1 foot in one second of time.

The thermal unit shall be the quantity of heat required to raise 1 ounce of water 1 degree of the scale of the Fahrenheit thermometer.

The water-pressure unit is the pressure of 1 ounce in weight upon the surface of 1 decimal square.

The steam-pressure unit is the pressure of 1 ounce in weight upon the surface of 1 decimal square.

The Bureau of Standards shall, upon the basis of the standard weights and measures herein established, determine the standards for technical application in the arts and sciences.

The silver coins of the United States shall be the dollar, the 2-franc piece, the franc, and the dime. The weight of the dollar shall be 1 ounce, 900 fine, of silver; the weight of the 2-franc piece shall be 400 grains, or two-fifths of 1 ounce of silver, 800 fine; the weight of the franc shall be 200 grains, or one-fifth of an ounce of silver, 800 fine; and the weight of the dime shall be 100 grains, or one-tenth of an ounce of silver, 800 fine.

The minor coins of the United States shall be the nickel, the penny, and the cent. The weight of the nickel shall be 100 grains of an alloy of three parts of copper and one part of nickel; the weight of the penny shall be 100 grains of an alloy of 95 per cent copper and 5 per cent of tin and zinc; and the weight of the cent shall be 50 grains of an alloy of 95 per cent of copper and 5 per cent of tin and zinc, in such proportions as shall be determined by the Director of the Mint.

The gold coins of the United States shall be the pound, the eagle, and the double eagle. The standard weight of the pound shall be 294.8 grains of gold, 900 fine; the weight of the eagle shall be 589.6 grains of gold, 900 fine; and the weight of the double eagle shall be 1,179.2 grains of gold, 900 fine.

The standard of value shall be the dollar, equivalent to 58.96 grains of gold, 900 fine, or one-fifth of the gold pound.

The coins of the United States shall have the following relative values: 1 cent equals 10 mills, 1 penny equals 2 cents, 1 nickel equals 5 cents, 1 dime equals 10 cents, 1 franc equals 20 cents, 1 franc equals 10 pence, 2 francs equal 40 cents, 1 dollar equals 100 cents, 1 dollar equals 5 francs, 1 pound equals 5 dollars, 1 pound equals 25 francs, 1 eagle equals 10 dollars, 1 eagle equals 2 pounds, 1 eagle equals 50 francs, 1 double eagle equals 20 dollars, 1 double eagle equals 4 pounds, 1 double eagle equals 100 francs.

Congress has never exercised the authority conferred expressly by the Constitution to fix the standard of weights and measures for the United States, although this was regarded as a necessary project at the time of the union of the Colonies. The Articles of Confederation contained a similar provision in regard to a uniform system of weights and measures for the Colonies.

The fact that our common measures, in terms of the foot, the inch, the pound, the ounce, and the ton, have been preferred to the metric system, is because of their great superiority in point of convenience. The meter itself is a very inconvenient and awkward measure. The metric system, moreover, offers no unit between the centimeter of about 4 inches and the meter of about 40 inches; that is to say, it offers no unit of measure that is adapted, in a practical way, to the customary needs of the people. This is demonstrated by the fact that our yard measure, which is even more convenient for our purposes than the meter, has itself gone into relative obsolescence with the extended use of the more convenient foot as the primary unit of mensuration. The height of mountains, the depth of the sea, and the dimensions of all artificial structures are determined by the foot measure.

The clear preference of custom for the foot is not to be ignored. It is not a restricted or provincial view which declares the superiority of the foot over the meter. The fact is that every important country in the world has a similar customary unit. For example, the Roman pes is 11.65 inches, the Danish fod is 1.03 feet, the Swedish fot is 11.69 inches, the Norwegian fot is 12.35 inches. The Russian foute is exactly 12 inches, the Rhine fuss is 1.03 feet, the Vienna fuss is 1.037 feet, the Portuguese and the Brazilian pè is 1.08 feet, the French pied is 1.066 feet, the Attic pous is 1.011 feet, the Olympic pous is 1.051 feet, and the Japanese shaku is 0.994 foot. It thus appears that every important country in the world has adapted its customs of trade and mechanics to a measure analogous and almost exactly comparable to our present English foot.

The only virtue in the metric system is the convenience of computation resulting from the decimal notation upon which it is arranged. But even in the matter of decimal notation the metric system goes to such absurd extremes that the decimal multiples of the meter have been ignored and many of its other denominations have gone into disuse. A true decimal system has its advantages and is to be desired. It must be said, however, that the utility of the decimal system is confined to the divisions of the unit or standard. The decimal arrangement has no special utility when dealing with integers or units in any number whatever. Upon this principle we have ignored our eagles and double eagles when counting dollars, and for the same reason dekameters, hektometers, and myriameters are not much used.

The great consideration is to preserve our customary units of measure and weight and to bring the divisions of the same into proper decimal relations. This will afford all the advantages of the decimal features of the metric system and preserve for us the great convenience of our own common measures. Inasmuch as these common measures are practically universal in all countries they offer the only true basis for a real international system.

The desirability of a decimal arrangement was clearly perceived by James Watt, the great English engineer and mechanician. In November, 1783, he proposed the international "philosophical pound" of 10 ounces and the division of the ounce into 1,000 grains. He said, "Let all elastic fluids be measured by the ounce measure of water by which the valuation of different cubic inches will be avoided and the common decimal tables of specific gravities will immediately give the weights of those elastic fluids." The ounce to which Watt referred is the weight of the cube of one-tenth of the foot of water at maximum density. Watt was quick to perceive this decimal relation between the foot and ounce and proposed that the measure of weight be thus derived from the measure of length. Watt expressly stated that the proper plan for an ideal decimal system should retain the foot and the ounce. In a letter to Mr. Magellan he said:

"As to the precise foot or pound, I do not look upon it to be very material, in chemistry at least. Either the common English foot may be adopted according to your proposal, which has the advantage that a cubic foot is exactly 1,000 ounces, consequently the present foot and ounce would be retained; or a pendulum which vibrates 100 times a minute may be adopted for the standard, which would make the foot 14.2 of our present inches, and the cubic foot would be very exactly a bushel and would weigh 101 of the present pounds, so that the present pound would not be much altered. But I think that by this scheme the foot would be too large and that the inconvenience of changing all the foot measures and things depending on them would be much greater than changing all the pounds, bushels, gallons, etc. I therefore give the preference to those plans which retain the foot and the ounce."

There was a great deal of speculation at the end of the eighteenth century with respect to finding some definite measure in the natural world to which our artificial measures might be referred. There is obviously no such unit within the possibility of practical application. The most definite measure we have is that of time made by the diurnal revolution of the earth, which we have divided into 86,400 seconds. The pendulum adjusted to vibrate in seconds has a definite length at a given altitude and latitude. The second pendulum vibrating in a vacuum at London is 39.13908 inches in length. The standard foot has been determined to be $\frac{1}{39.13908}$ of the second pendulum at London, and by this method the foot has been referred to the second pendulum just as definitely as though it were an aliquot part of the pendulum. The theoretical advantage of changing the foot to the one-third or one-fourth part of the second pendulum would in no wise compensate for the tremendous inconvenience which would result. The present relation between the foot and the ounce by which the measures of weight may be derived from the measures of length would be definitely dislocated. The proper plan, therefore, is to decimalize the foot.

Thomas Jefferson clearly perceived this, and in 1790, while Secretary of State, elaborated a plan for this purpose. Jefferson divided the foot into inches, lines, and points comparable with the division of the French pied into pouces, lignes, and points. The French division is upon the duo-decimal system, whereas Jefferson's arrangement is upon the decimal system. The bill which has been introduced is in conformity with the original conception of Watt and with the essentials of Jefferson's plan. It is entirely practical and makes no radical alterations in our present measures, but merely points the way to their improvement in a true and convenient decimal system.

The foot is the unit from which the whole system is derived. One-tenth of the foot, or the decimal inch, is the primary division in the system. The square of the decimal inch is called the decimal square, and the cube of the decimal inch is called the decimal cube. The decimal cube of water at maximum density is the ounce. The ounce is divided into 1,000 grains, or, more properly, decimal grains, and the cube or cubic foot of water at maximum density is equal to 1,000 ounces and is called the weight unit. Thirty-two of these weight units constitute one ton.

It is intended that the decimal grain will be the unit for fine weights in the mechanical and chemical sciences, the ounce the unit for retail trade weights, and the weight unit for the measure of gross weights. It is intended that the point, 1,000 of which are equal to 1 foot, and 100 of which are equal to the decimal inch, will be the unit for fine mechanical and scientific measuration, in place of the fractions of the inch, the centimeter, and the millimeter. The proposed system is entirely logical, consistent, and practical and is built upon units long sanctioned by custom and utility. It brings order into our customary system of weights and measures and is formulated for this purpose. The time has come when Congres should exercise its constitutional power to establish a uniform, rationalized system of measures and weights for the United States. The plan proposed offers the only alternative to the metric system and is superior from every point of view to the metric system for our country.

It is also intrinsically superior as the standard for a true international system of mensuration.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD S. BROOKS,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 2, 1920.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am particularly interested in this amendment providing for appropriation for continuing the work of commercial attachés in foreign countries, because I know of the importance of their work. My home, York city, is the third city in the great manufacturing State of Pennsylvania in point of diversified manufacturing industries. Only two cities in my State make a larger variety of goods.

The exporters of my city and of the entire country want this service continued, and I insist their needs should be regarded. I received the following letter from Hon. A. B. Farquhar, president of the A. B. Farquhar Co. (Ltd.), of York, Pa.:

YORK, PA., February 26, 1920.

Hon. E. S. BROOKS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BROOKS: As a manufacturer of over 60 years and an exporter for over 50 years I have followed the work of the commercial attachés with a great deal of interest. This work has been of immense service and should be continued and enlarged, care being taken that our attachés should be familiar with business methods and, above all, with the language of the country to which they are sent. Notice the disposition on the part of some Members of Congress to drop this important department. Such action could only come of want of knowledge of their advantage and even necessity to the business of the country. We can not grow rich swapping jackknives; we must have foreign trade; and the commercial attaché is an important factor in foreign trade.

Very truly, yours,

A. B. FARQUHAR.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. GARLAND DUPRÉ,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 2, 1920.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following resolutions of the New Orleans Board of Trade:

THE NEW ORLEANS BOARD OF TRADE, LTD.,
February 25, 1920.

Hon. H. GARLAND DUPRÉ,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Herewith please find resolutions adopted by the board of trade following the announcement made through the press that the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives had favorably reported a cut in the estimate for the foreign trade bureau of the Department of Commerce.

These resolutions are self-explanatory, and I sincerely trust that when the matter is presented to you, you will oppose vigorously the proposed cut.

Yours, very truly,

WARREN KEARNY, President.

Resolutions adopted by the New Orleans Board of Trade (Ltd.) February 21, 1920.

Whereas press reports announce that the Appropriation Committee of the House of Representatives has reported in favor of cutting the foreign-trade estimates of the Department of Commerce from $1,658,000 to $490,000; and

Whereas Secretary of Commerce Alexander advises that this reduction is the most serious blow ever aimed from within at our foreign trade, the sum allowed being only one-half of the appropriation now used; at the very time when our rivals have an almost overwhelming trade advantage in exchange rates, this bill proposes to handicap American manufacturers by practically withdrawing the helping hand of the Government. Almost on the day when our merchant marine becomes a fact, it is virtually announced that foreign trade is not worth supporting.

Funds for the promotion of trade in the Far East are cut in half. This means a great slacking of effort in a district where Japan, Germany, and England are redoubling their efforts.

The great markets of the East will return a thousandfold every dollar this Government spends there. The effect of the bill is the abolition of the department's commercial attachés and the reduction in the number of foreign-trade commissioners, despite the rapidly changing conditions in Europe and the critical reconstruction developments with which they have kept American manufacturers in touch.

As a result of the cut in appropriations, district offices must be abolished in New York, Boston, Chicago, St. Louis, New Orleans, San Francisco, Seattle, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Dayton, Los Angeles, and Portland, Oreg.: Therefore be it

Resolved by the foreign-trade development committee, That the Board of Trade of New Orleans be requested to take immediate action in protesting to our Representatives in Congress against this extraordinary action undertaken in the name of economy, but which will result instead in great loss to the country's growing export trade now in the critical stage of development, and requiring the valuable assistance of the foreign-trade branch of the Department of Commerce in fostering its growth and expansion; be it further

Resolved, That the New Orleans Board of Trade take steps to secure the cooperation of commercial bodies throughout the South and Middle West in an effort to secure the passage of a bill carrying an adequate amount for the continuance and enlargement of the foreign-trade branch of the Department of Commerce.

WARREN KEARNY, President.
THOMAS F. CUNNINGHAM,
Chairman Foreign Trade Development Committee.

Spanish-American Pension Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. WILL TAYLOR,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 1, 1920.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen from Texas [Messrs. CONNALLY, BLACK, and RAYBURN] take the ungenerous and anomalous position that inasmuch as this bill relieves the veterans of the Spanish-American War and the Philippine insurrection from the necessity of tracing their disabilities to service origin that, therefore, this bill is vicious and ought to be defeated. Why, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this very provision so strenuously objected to by these distinguished gentlemen from the Lone Star State is the very basis, soul, and substance of this very meritorious measure and the chief reason for its enactment. These men came to the rescue of the Government in times of stress, and for this Government to treat them now as the priest and Levite treated the man who fell among thieves, when they have suffered misfortune and are in need of assistance—whether that misfortune resulted from their military service or not—would be the basest sort of ingratitude. The principle that the man who helped you when you were in trouble is entitled to similar treatment at your hands when he finds himself similarly situated applies with equal propriety to the relation of the country to its citizens. This principle is as old as justice herself, and it finds its highest expression and exemplification in the golden rule.

Simply because an American soldier, after he retires to civil pursuits and for some cause becomes disabled to earn a livelihood, can not trace his disability to his military service should be no bar to a pension at the hands of the Government, and a Government that would insist on such a barbarous and ungrateful condition would not, and could not, deserve long to endure.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON,

OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 2, 1920.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, in view of certain legislation now pending before Congress which proposes to appropriate $50,000,000 from the Federal Treasury for the ostensible purpose of giving food relief to Europe, I can not but feel that the report recently made by the Federal grand jury at Spokane is of especial interest and significance at this time, and under leave granted herewith append same for the consideration of Congress and the American people:

HOOVER IS HELPING SPECULATORS BY HIS PROPAGANDA, SAYS JURY—GOVERNMENT PURCHASE OF WHEAT AND FLOUR FOR EUROPE "WOULD MAKE PEOPLE HERE FOOT BILLS."

SPOKANE, WASH., February 29.

The Federal grand jury which recently ended its sessions here has made a scathing report to the United States Department of Justice, expressing belief that wheat speculators have used the credit of the United States Government to corner the great bulk of its stupendous 1919 wheat crop; that through their manipulations the price of wheat, and consequently the price of bread, has been increased 50 per cent.

Officials high in the United States Grain Corporation, organized by the Government to protect its citizens against just such manipulation, are mentioned in the report. At least one of them is accused of manipulating grain on a gigantic scale and reaping immense profit to himself.

Declaring that the Government can reduce the price of flour and related necessities whenever it so elects, the grand jury demands an immediate investigation into all grain centers of the United States. The report follows:

"When the Government appropriated $1,000,000,000 to buy the 1919 wheat crop, wheat receipts became as good as Government bonds. Banks were glad to loan money in any quantity to purchase wheat, for the money paid the farmers was immediately redeposited in the banks.

"The minimum price of wheat was fixed in the Northwest at $2.20 for soft wheat and $2.22 for hard wheat, coast points, and the prices paid the farmers were these sums, less freight to coast points, averaging about 13 cents per bushel, and certain other charges, which amounted to from 4 to 6 cents per bushel. In some cases a small premium was paid for hard wheat.

"The majority of the mills in the Northwest are owned by a half dozen concerns, and each in turn has a grain company, which is officered and operated by the men who own the milling concerns.

"EIGHTY-FIVE PER CENT OF CROP CORNERED.

"From a great mass of testimony presented before the grand jury we believe that 85 per cent of the 1919 wheat crop of this State, estimated at 42,000,000 bushels, went into the hands of these half dozen grain companies and was purchased prior to October 15, before any material advance in price.

"The banks of this State are honeycombed with warehouse receipts. Spokane banks at one time were carrying $9,000,000 worth of warehouse receipts, and it is not unusual to find that a small country bank has loaned $1,000,000 on wheat receipts.

"Having bought practically all of the wheat in the States of Oregon and Washington, these grain companies have been able to advance the price by sales to each other and through manipulations of the grain market centered at Minneapolis and by other methods.

"HOW PRICE WAS BOOSTED.

"Although the greater part of the wheat was purchased around $2.07, the grain companies are selling the wheat to their own milling concerns at the prevailing market price, which at present is from $3 to $3.30 per bushel for hard wheat. Their own mills are asserting the rights to manufacture flour on the basis of the price paid for the wheat—a price which is the result of their own acts of manipulation.

"The by-products of flour, bran, and shorts are a necessary food for dairy cattle, and the prices now demanded for these by-products mean destruction of the dairy industry.

"Under regulations existing in 1918, millers were prohibited from making more than 50 cents a ton on mill feeds, and a 'fair' price on carload lots was fixed by the United States Food Administrator at $28.75 per ton, while to-day mill feeds are selling in Spokane at $43 per ton, carload lots, and $50 at coast points.

"The Pacific Grain Co., the successor of the M. H. Houser Grain Co., the Pacific Coast Elevator Co., and the Puget Sound Warehouse & Elevator Co., are owned and operated in connection with the Portland Flour Mills concern, with headquarters at Portland, Oreg.

"BELIEVES HOUSER A MANIPULATOR.

"These corporations were owned by M. H. Houser, vice president of the United States Grain Corporation for the northwestern district. At the time he became vice president he made some kind of a transfer of his interests in these concerns, and does not at this time appear as the owner.

"The offices of the United States Grain Corporation for the northwestern district and the offices of the above named being located in a building owned by M. H. Houser in Portland, Oreg., it is, by reason thereof, the belief of the grand jurors that he, Houser, is the real party in interest in the milling and grain concerns above named, and that by reason of his connection with the United States Grain Corporation he has been able to manipulate and operate them to an immense profit to himself and associates.

"The Pacific Grain Co. admits having bought 11,000,000 bushels of the 1919 wheat crop.

"It is impossible for this district to obtain relief, for the grain companies threaten in case action is taken to force them to sell the grain to the mills at the price paid by them, plus a reasonable carrying charge, to close the mills and ship the grain to eastern points.

"ASKS ACTION ALL OVER COUNTRY.

"To frustrate any concerted plan of evasion, we would urge that the Department of Justice take simultaneous action in all wheat and flour centers of the United States.

"Lately the press reported that Julius Barnes, president of the United States Grain Corporation, had joined with Herbert Hoover in the purchase of one of the large newspapers of Washington, D. C. We now note daily newspaper articles which seem to indicate a propaganda is being carried on through the newspapers by Mr. Hoover, urging the financing on a huge scale of flour and wheat to foreign countries.

"According to press reports, former Secretary of the Treasury GLASS recommended to Congress the appropriation of $150,000,000 to purchase flour and wheat. It is our belief that this wheat is now owned largely by speculators and, in some cases, by interests directly and indirectly connected with some of the officers of the United States Grain Corporation. Sales to Europe will benefit only the purse of individuals and the consumer will pay the bills.

"GOVERNMENT CREDIT USED BY SPECULATORS.

"We believe the credit of this Government, through the national and Federal reserve banks, has been used by wheat speculators to carry the great bulk of the 1919 wheat crop, and that it is within the power of the Government to reduce the price of flour and related necessities whenever it chooses to act.

"Under section 5 of the act approved March 4, 1919, commonly known as the wheat-guaranty act, the President of the United States is given the power by proclamation to find what is a fair, just, or reasonable practice, device, rate, commission, charge, profit, or price. And we would recommend that a proclamation be issued under said act fixing a selling price of all wheat now held in the United States at the price paid the farmers, plus a reasonable carrying charge, said fixed price not to apply to the producer, and that similar prices be fixed on flour and mill feeds.

"We further recommend that no appropriation be made by Congress to finance the sales of wheat, flour, or mill products to foreign countries until such time as the American people are relieved from paying the extortionate prices now required of them by reason of the grain manipulation as herein stated.

"Dated this 7th day of February, 1920.

"GEORGE W. FULLER, Secretary."

Mr. Speaker, the Federal grand jury charge that there has never been such an orgy of profiteering in the history of the world as has been witnessed under this administration is absolutely correct. Where is that "pitiless publicity" of which the President prated so much when he first took office? What has become of his pledge made to the American people early in 1913 that he would reduce the cost of living? Why has it increased over 80 per cent since he took office? In this connection it may not be amiss to throw a little light on the sugar situation, and incidentally place the blame for the sugar shortage and the unheard-of prices which we now have to pay where it belongs.

On July 29, 1919, the Sugar Equalization Board, which was appointed by President Wilson to regulate the price and distribution of sugar during the war, was approached by representatives of the Cuban producers and offered the entire Cuban crop for 1919–20, or so much of it as might be necessary, at a price of about 6½ cents per pound. The board, with one exception, joined in recommending to President Wilson that the offer be accepted. This was on August 14. On September 20, having received no response from President Wilson—he was probably too busy with the League of Nations covenant to pay attention to so small a matter as the sugar supply of the American people—the president of the Sugar Equalization Board again wrote Mr. Wilson, informing him that quick action was necessary if the Cuban crop was to be secured. On September 23 the Cuban representatives advised the board that its offer was withdrawn.

The administration did not display any great interest in the Cuban sugar crop, but when the sugar crop from that rock-ribbed State of Democracy, Louisiana, was nearly ready for the market the Department of Justice, or rather Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer himself, sent the following telegram to the United States attorney at New Orleans, which speaks for itself and utterly refutes statements subsequently made by him:

NOVEMBER 8, 1919.

MOONEY,
United States Attorney, New Orleans, La.:

Your wire of the 8th, detailing results of conference. Consider agreed price rather high, but hereby concur in maximum fixed price of 17 cents for Louisiana plantation clarifieds, 18 cents for Louisiana clear granulated. Understanding that all contracts for a higher figure to be abrogated. Further suggest, if possible, you secure an agreement in writing by authorized committee of Louisiana producers and refiners, to be used as prima facie evidence where prices are charged in excess of agreement. You are hereby instructed to immediately prosecute any violator of this agreed price.

PALMER.

To-day sugar is selling as high as 25 cents per pound in Minnesota, and not a great deal to be had. England bought a large portion of the Cuban crop and speculators gobbled the balance. The speculators have been holding festive sway, and the Americans have been and are being robbed of millions and millions of dollars. An increase of 2 cents per pound in the cost of sugar represents an additional expense of $180,000,000 to the people at large. The amount in excessive profits which was made possible by the President's failure to act will run well up around the billion mark and may exceed that figure. I foresee that it will be possible for the Democratic national committee to raise the $5,000,000 campaign fund which they will use this year from the sugar speculators alone. It should not be necessary to call upon the hundreds and thousands of others who have amassed huge fortunes from fat war contracts and inside tips on the stock market.

Congress has given the Department of Justice everything it has asked for in the way of legislation to check profiteering. We have extended the life of the Lever food control act; we have done likewise for the Sugar Equalization Board and the Grain Corporation. We were told that all this was necessary to enable the Attorney General to act. Has he? Yes; he has compromised the Government's suit against the packers in a way most advantageous to the Big Five packers, who are paying the farmers less than 7 cents for cattle on the hoof, while we have to pay as high as 45 cents. Hogs bring less than 20 cents alive, while we are paying 38 and 40 cents per pound for the finished article. The Government minimum price on wheat was maintained until the farmers had sold nearly all of their crop. As soon as the speculators got hold of it prices commenced to soar. Ye gods, has there ever been such an orgy and saturnalia of profiteering in the history of man? If so, when and where? I fail to find anything like it in the annals of history. Think of a dollar only buying four pounds of sugar. Is it any wonder that the people are in an angry mood? The grumblings which the Attorney General hears over the country are not the mutterings of Bolshevists, as he would have us believe, but they come from a long-suffering people, who have been robbed and plundered by unscrupulous individuals who spell patriotism with a "y," and who would substitute the dollar mark for the stars in the beautiful emblem for which thousands and thousands have fought, bled, and died. But, my friends, let us not be dismayed or cast down. Just as sure as there is a God in the heavens, so sure will the great American people, the greatest jury in the world, register their verdict in November, and that verdict will consign the Democratic Party, the party of inefficiency, waste—yes, and worse—to the scrap heap, where it belongs. It has shown its utter incapacity to rule, and a woeful disregard for the best interests of the people as a whole.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. BABKA,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, March 3, 1920.

Mr. BABKA. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday next the first American transport is destined to leave Danzig, the port of what is now the free country of Poland. Thousands of soldiers of Polish origin who resided in this country at the outbreak of the late war and who volunteered for service in the armies of our allies, because of their ineligibility to serve in our Army by reason of the fact that they were not citizens of the United States and, in the cases of many of them, because they came from that part of Poland under Prussian rule, are stranded in camps near this port, unable to come home, as they are without funds. They were unable to save anything out of their meager pay, which was made up of voluntary contributions and which was barely enough to keep their bodies and souls together. They were transported across the seas on the transports of our allies, Great Britain and France, neither of whom seem able to assist them now. Mr. Speaker, these men were actuated by the spirit of most noble patriotism to go to the assistance of the land of their origin in its hour of need. Many of them tried to enlist in our Army, but because of the technical obstacles in the way were denied admittance. They fought to preserve and maintain the same ideals that our boys fought for; their cause was our cause; and now that the war is over and the work done it is fitting and proper that our Government bring them back to their adopted land, the land which they left only to serve the high and noble purposes that I have mentioned. When they embarked upon this noble journey many of them left wives and children behind in this country. Their families are anxiously waiting for their early return. They need their support. They were willing to bear the burdens of life while the conflict was on, but now that it is over it is only just and fair that their husbands, fathers, and brothers be returned to them. Mr. Speaker, I know of no nobler act that we can do than to give our assistance to these valiant men. They will no doubt prove an asset to our country. They are of a people that have long been a credit to our citizenship. Men of Polish blood have served with honor and distinction in our Army. Two splendid young men of Polish blood, namely, Adam Blazikowski and John Cochanski, citizens of Ironwood, Mich., have the honor of capturing the first German prisoners in the war. We need more men of the noble spirit that these men have exhibited in this country. You do not find any Reds among their class. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to note the almost unanimous approval of this resolution by this House.

Penny Postage.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. B. ROUSE,
OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, March 4, 1920.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, on the 7th day of December, 1916, I introduced in the House of Representatives a bill to reduce the postage on local first-class mail and on mail matter of the first class on local rural routes. The wording of the bill was as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon all mail matter of the first class and all mail matter of the first class on local rural routes postage shall be charged on and after the 1st day of July, 1917, at the rate of 1 cent per ounce or fraction thereof.

This bill was never considered by the House on account of the World War.

On December 5, 1919, I reintroduced the bill, using the same language except as to the date on which the bill would be effective. The reintroduced bill provides for the reduction of postage to be effective July 1, 1920.

I referred this bill to the Postmaster General and asked for the attitude of the department on same. I insert herewith a letter from the Postmaster General giving his indorsement to the provisions of the bill:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 3, 1920.

Hon. A. B. ROUSE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. ROUSE: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of the 29th instant, inclosing a copy of bill H. R. 11203, introduced by you, for the reduction of postage on first-class mail intended for local delivery.

The rates of postage on the various classes of mail should be more equitably arranged. At this time the first-class mail yields a very large profit, while there is a very heavy loss in the transportation and handling of mail of the second class. As the rates on second-class mail have been increased during the past two years and will continue to be increased under the present law until July 1, 1921, when they will reach the maximum, it is believed that the public should have the benefit of these increases through reduced rates on the class of mail which now yields the greatest profit and what is known as drop letters or first-class mail intended for local delivery. As your bill proposes to do this, it has my approval and I trust it will be favorably acted on at an early date.

Sincerely,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Mr. Speaker, on the 13th day of January, while the annual Post Office appropriation bill was before the House, I inserted in my remarks on the bill a statement which I obtained from Hon. John C. Koons, First Assistant Postmaster General, which showed that during the three months of October, November, and December, 1919, the revenues of the Post Office Department were increased more than 10 per cent over the corresponding period of 1918, and bear in mind during the same months of 1918 the people were paying 3 cents an ounce on first-class matter.

These figures show the enormous increase in business in the Post Office Department. It is estimated that the profit on first-class postage amounts to approximately $72,000,000 a year and the profit on parcel post amounts to $10,000,000 a year.

The reduction may not be equaled in dollars by increased business the first year of its adoption, but, in my opinion, it will more than make up the loss in postage after the first year.

The faithful employees who administer the Postal Service are entitled to an increased compensation. The commission to investigate postal salaries, of which I have the honor of being a member, should make its report in the near future in order that the increases, which I firmly believe will be provided for, can be included in the appropriation bill which will become effective the 1st of July.

If there is a surplus after the payment of all appropriations, it should be distributed among those who make possible the many millions of profit.

Compulsory Military Training.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. MASON,
OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, March 4, 1920.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, one of the live questions before Congress and the people is the compulsory military training bill. As I was desirous of taking the sentiment of the people in my State, I addressed a letter to the Republican precinct committeemen, more than 3,000, outside of Chicago. In the letter asking for this opinion I gave my reasons for opposing the first bill introduced, which had the approval, as I was informed, of the administration and General Staff. It is House bill 8287. It was introduced by the distinguished chairman, Mr. KAHN. I wished my constituents to know why I opposed that bill. I asked these two direct questions, as follows: "Are you in favor of compulsory military training of all American boys of 18 years of age? Second, if you favor the general principle, are you in favor of passing that law at the present time?" Over 1,500 have answered, all courteously, as Republican committeemen always do. I have received so far very few who have answered that they were in favor of compulsory military training. At this time in making this statement, to be entirely fair, out of the more than fifteen hundred answers received at least fourteen hundred are opposed to compulsory training, and so answered in response to the first question. Out of the 150 who answered that they were in favor of compulsory military training, more—very much more than one-half of them—qualified their answers, some of them saying it should be done in the public schools, some saying that it should not be done under the present administration, but not 2 in 100 of the answers I have received have answered that they were in favor of compulsory military training and in favor of beginning now. I have received letters from these same committeemen, at least 300, giving a variety of reasons for opposing compulsory military training in any form.

Many of them have stated on the cards or in the letters that they are opposed to it, because just now they need all the help of their boys, particularly on the farms; scores of them have opposed it because they say that they do not want their boys put under the training of the Regular Army at 18 on account of the temptations that surround; hundreds of them have said that compulsory military training is what killed the Kaiser, and we do not want to imitate him; and hundreds of them have said we have millions of young men already trained and they will volunteer in case of emergency. Many of them say we have taxes enough now; very many of them replied stating they have no reply to my request to get the sentiment of the voting people in their precincts, and in every such case they stated that practically everyone they talked to was opposed to compulsory military training. Some of them responded saying I could use their names, but not having that authority from all I shall not take the liberty of using their names. In my letter of request I asked those who favored the immediate passage of the compulsory training bill to suggest how to get the money, and out of those who were in favor of the immediate passage of a compulsory military training measure only two suggested the means of raising the revenue. One was to discharge a lot of Government employees and one suggested an increase in the surplus-profit tax. I think it fair to set out here a copy of the letter I wrote them, and if any of my colleagues find that I have misquoted any part of the bill I was discussing I shall be glad to have my attention called to it. It may be stated that other bills have been or will be introduced that are less offensive, and we will take care of those bills when they are presented to the House. One of my correspondents favored putting all of the boys of 18 after three months service into the Regular Army and then into war, in case of war. The act of May 18, 1917, and August 31, 1918, immediately comes into force and uses as far as possible the organization created by this act. One of my correspondents who favors this says that I should take the figures of an expert as to the cost.

Of course, no two experts agree. The estimates agree that there will be a million boys compelled to train the first year and one and one-half million the second year, and anyone now who will look over the cost of the present administration of "mobilizing" can not fail to reach the conclusion that it will take in the second year at least a billion dollars. The loss to the Government in production alone, in the farms, factories, and offices, would be at least $500,000,000, and the debt we have to pay, which we must pay by production, will grow larger instead of smaller. One enthusiastic correspondent who wants this money spent, and spent now, does not stop at all to consider that the manner of raising taxes is more burdensome now than ever. The internal-revenue tax has been depleted, as we all know; the import duties, under the low tariff passed by our Democratic brethren, does not produce within a million dollars a day of what it ought to produce and what it did under a protective tariff. So that all taxes are direct taxes and add to the high cost of living. We know there is great unrest, and we know that unrest comes from the fact that the income of those who work has not kept pace with the high cost of living. The farmer is taxed in every way, not only on his implements but the high cost of living in his family and for labor. This tax on farmers makes it necessary for him to get more on everything, including the hides of his cattle. The tanner must get more for tanning the hides; every man in the shoe factory, including the owner, must have more for manufacturing the shoes, so that all of this taxation is reflected in the high price of the shoes, and that tax on the consumer of the shoes is the same to the man who labors as it is to the millionaire. This is true of everything that we eat and wear, everything that we consume, and I defy any student to show how it is possible to add even $500,000,000 annual taxes without increasing the high cost of living. If the man who labors must pay more for his food and clothing, he must have an increased wage, and if Mr. Rockefeller is called upon for additional taxes, he adds it to the price of gasoline for your car and kerosene for your lamps. So I most respectfully insist that even one-half a billion dollars added to our tax is the burning of our candle at both ends. The direct tax adds to the cost of living, and taking the stalwart young men off of the farms and out of the shops and offices destroys production, and that decreases the supply and also adds to the high cost of living. Mr. Speaker, there may come a time when you can please the people by increasing their burdens, but that time is not now.

I wish, in conclusion, to answer the claims of those who are in favor of immediate compulsory military training. Of course, we all believe in preparedness. There are many things necessary to be prepared. One of the essential things is the man power. The other essential thing is to have the machinery of war, including equipment and supplies for every one of the many branches of the military service, and when those people who are supporting the lobby here in Washington to secure immediate compulsory military training send out their propaganda that the United States suffered by reason of the inefficiency of our man power, I deny it. The young men of this country were ready to fight our battles and prepared to do it long before we were ready to arm and equip them for the service. If delays came, it was not from want of patriotism, it was not from the failure of brain, heart, or muscle in the American youth. These delays came from the incompetence of big business men of this country and from the failure of the administration to function in the preparation of arms, ammunition, airplanes, and guns, great and small. One of the circulars issued by the organization that questions the loyalty and patriotism of every man who disagreed with them sends out this circular trying to make it appear that loss of honor and prestige came to the American arms by reason of the untrained condition of our boys. I will not recount now the shame and disgrace from the waste of the billion dollars in the hands of the airplane incompetents, nor would I mention the fact of the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars to build a powder city without producing a pound of powder for the Army, nor would I call attention to the billion dollars that was stolen by the contract traitorous profiteers from our country while we were at war, if it were not for the fact that many of those men who have grown rich on Government contracts and whose property came by reason of the delays in manufacture, are now the ones who are crying for this additional tax for compulsory military training, and claim that our delays in preparedness was by reason of the lack of training in the man power. Have you forgotten that under section 6 we authorized the President of the United States to take over a hundred thousand men who were ready to go with Roosevelt to fight the very first campaign after the declaration of war? Have you forgotten that I charged on this floor that this very President refused to let them go on account of his political animosity toward Roosevelt? Have you forgotten how you explained by saying that they did not have the Army equipment? Have you forgotten how in many camps they drilled with broomsticks? Have you forgotten how the Secretary of War delayed the manufacture of machine guns?

Have you read Pershing's report, where in cold, cold figures he shows the unpreparedness of the War Department? Will you turn to page 69 of his report, and find that in four months of 1918, when he had cabled for supplies, during these months the Government failed to send him over 960,000 tons of supplies which he had asked for? Have you forgotten our shortage of ships, and will you still lay our misfortune to failure of man power while you were preparing to sell a great fleet of ships to our commercial rivals for 20 per cent of their actual value? If we want to be prepared, let the Military Affairs Committee, in response to my resolution, recommend some legislation so that the War and Navy Departments may have a complete knowledge of every manufacturing plant in the United States, so that on 24 hours' notice they could begin to supply arms, munitions, and equipment. In our own arsenals we should have presses, drills, and all of the other machinery necessary in the preparation of our defense. Then let us have a good, strong standing Army, as provided for in the present bill; maintain liberally our training of officers at West Point and Annapolis; give good pay to these men who make military service their life work; keep a few of the powder plants that you have spent so much money to build, instead of giving them away to speculators, and let the Regular Army keep them in order and ready for quick action—and even then, with all of the war material to be supplied at quick notice, the patriotic young men of this country will be ready to shoot before you will be ready to give them a gun.

Mr. Speaker, I am tired of reading the stuff from the millionaires' club about the failure of man power. Once again, in defense of my position, I return to the report of Gen. Pershing. Read, I beg of you, his report on the actual battles of the war; read the different phases of the Argonne, Chateau-Thierry. Begin with the first engagement; read, in his simple language, how, when it was left for him to choose between two sectors and he chose the more difficult one, because, "in my opinion, no other allied troops had the morale or the offensive spirit to overcome successfully the difficulties that had to be met in the Meuse-Argonne sector * * * and so the Meuse-Argonne front was chosen."

That sector had a front of 150 kilometers. Read how they moved, these "untrained, undisciplined" boys under the command of Pershing, moved and carried out the plan agreed to between Foch and Pershing. At sunrise September 12 they overwhelmed the enemy, and all of the objectives were reached by the afternoon of September 13. They captured 16,000 prisoners, 443 guns, large stores of material and supplies. On the 15th and 16th they moved beyond the objectives originally laid down and stabilized the line, the line that the enemy never crossed again except as a prisoner of war. Pershing says with his characteristic modesty: "The material results of the victory achieved were very important. An American Army was an accomplished fact, and the enemy had felt its power. No form of propaganda could overcome the depressing effect on the morale of the enemy of this demonstration of our ability to organize a large American force and drive it successfully through his defenses. It gave our troops implicit confidence in their superiority and raised their morale to the highest pitch." Read his report on the different phases of the Argonne; find in it one word, if you can, of the lack of training; no such complaint is there; but he says in conclusion of his report of the second phase on the Argonne: "It was the spirit of determination animating every American soldier that made it impossible for the enemy to maintain the struggle until 1919."

Thousands of our men had been well trained in the National Guard, thousands had been well trained as cadets in the public schools. Every lad that attended one of the "little schoolhouses" had drilled into him every day two great essentials for the soldier—love of country and courage. No, Mr. Speaker; let those who believe in militarism burden the people with more taxes if they will, let them add to the high cost of living, let them take the boys out from the influence of home, placed in units in the Regular Army, make them, if you will, subject to the Articles of War before they are 19 years old, to be used in any form asked by Congress, whenever and wherever the President of the United States may direct; but when you make this step in imitation of the Kaiser, do not say that it was necessary by reason of inefficiency on the part of the American youth.

Commercial Attachés.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERNEST R. ACKERMAN,
OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, March 3, 1920.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly to have to differ with the committee that has given so much time and consideration to this bill, to the extent of having held hearings on the same which produced 2,600 pages of testimony, and if the times were of only ordinary importance I would hesitate long and seriously before attempting to put my judgment against those who have served so much longer in the House than I have. However, I happen to have seen the activities of our competitor nations in every continent, and I believe it would be highly unwise at the present time, in view of the great importance of maintaining our foreign trade, especially when foreign nations have announced that they are not going to purchase from us anything more than they possibly can do so, therefore it seems to me to be the very occasion when we should put forth not only extra efforts to retain the trade which we already have but additional efforts so as to increase it.

In the district which I have the honor of representing are located manufactories having world-wide points of distribution for their products, and the hold they have in the markets of the world must be maintained if they are to keep up home activities and thus keep therein steadily employed the thousands of employees now earning remunerative wages.

I have seen the products of their factories in Constantinople and Beirut, Cairo and Wady-Halfa, Caracas and Port of Spain, Rio de Janeiro and Santos, Montevideo and Valparaiso, Buenos Aires and Mendoza, Yokohama and Osaka, Shanghai and Peking, Reikjavik and Tromsoe, Calcutta and Darjeeling, Rangoon and Mandelay, Hongkong and Macau, Mukden and Seoul, Kobe and Nagasaki, Batavia and Djokakarta, Colombo and Kandy, Palermo and Naples, Kingston and St. Vincent, Progreso and Merida, Guadalajara and Chihuahua, Madrid and Lisbon, Singapore and Johore, Agra and Delhi, Prague and Botzen, Warsaw and Helsingfors, Leichtenstein and Monaco.

Last fall when in Paris in the interest of the trade-finance bill which I had the honor of introducing into the House last July, and which has since become a law, I had an interview with Francois Crozier, the ministere plenipotentiaire and directeur de l'office national du commerce exterieur. He told me of the vigorous policy that the French were about adopting in their efforts to extend their foreign trade, and one of them was the chartering of a special train to traverse the Dominion of Canada next summer for a period of 80 days which would carry large samples of everything that France had to sell and which they wanted Canada to buy, and which was to be accompanied by commercial attachés that could intelligently explain whatever inquiries might be made by intending purchasers.

May I also be permitted to refer to the many resolutions that have been passed by trade organizations explaining why it would be unwise to curtail this service at the present time?

Here are the resolutions unanimously adopted Friday, February 27, at a meeting of protest held in New York City, against the reduction of funds for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, at which the following large trade organizations were represented: National Foreign Trade Council, National Association of Manufacturers, American Manufacturers' Export Association, American Exporters and Importers' Association, Merchants' Association of New York, National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, American Bankers' Association, National Association of Credit Men, Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce, Tanners' Council of the United States of America, Rubber Association of America, American Chamber of Commerce for Brazil, International Association of Garment Manufacturers, New York Board of Trade and Transportation, Bridgeport Chamber of Commerce, Queens Borough Chamber of Commerce, and Bronx Board of Trade:

Whereas this is an appropriate time for constructive economy by Congress, but is most certainly not the time for a false economy which will hamper or restrict our foreign commerce and thereby diminish the Government revenues; and

Whereas the export trade of the United States must be maintained in order to supply an outlet for the full productive capacity of our factories, and in order to maintain conditions of steady employment after the present abnormal domestic demand has subsided; and

Whereas such foreign trade is seriously menaced in many of our best known foreign markets by adverse exchange and by the ever-increasing competition of foreign nations; and

Whereas the value of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, especially to our smaller manufacturers, has been definitely established; and

Whereas the services afforded by the bureau under the appropriations requested of Congress are inadequate properly to carry on the work of obtaining and disseminating information on foreign markets; and

Whereas the work of the commercial attachés of the bureau is vital to the successful maintenance of the service of foreign information; and

Whereas Great Britain maintains commercial secretaries in most of her foreign embassies and legations, and is making elaborate plans to land governmental support to British foreign trade; and

Whereas our Government has been requested for enormous sums for military and naval purposes (Army, $982,000,000; fortifications, $117,000,000; Military Academy, $6,000,000; Navy, $573,000,000), while the "services of construction" have asked for the meager appropriation of $1,833,190, in order to support a foreign trade valued in 1919 at over $10,000,000,000; and

Whereas the Customs Service of our Government has been so handicapped by lack of funds as to result in the serious delay in the compilation of our import and export figures; and

Whereas such delay is resulting in the falsification and vitiation of our trade statistics; and

Whereas 15,000,000 American people are directly supported by American foreign trade, including in this number all elements of our agricultural, industrial, seafaring, railroad, and raw material workers: Be it

Resolved, That the original appropriation of $1,833,190 requested the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is inadequate to carry on this important work; that any decrease in this appropriation would be disastrous to American foreign trade; that the commercial attachés' service is essential to the securing of authentic business information nowhere else obtainable; that the Customs Service should be granted funds adequate to maintain an accurate and up-to-date service of trade statistics; that all other departments of the Government concerned with foreign trade should be granted sufficient appropriations to enable them to deal in a constructive manner with a national foreign trade that has undergone enormous developments; that the previous policy of Congress favorable to foreign trade, as evidenced by the Webb law, Edge law, etc., can be reversed only at the risk of hampering seriously our foreign trade and of causing thereby conditions of employment and general depression; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, and of the argument on which it is based, be submitted to all Members of Congress; and that a committee be appointed to bring this matter to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives.

Therefore I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Return of the Polish Legion to the United States.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN,
OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, March 3, 1920,

On the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 156) authorizing the Secretary of War to bring back on Army transports from Danzig, Poland, residents of the United States of Polish origin who were engaged in the war on the side of the allied and associated powers.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution should pass at once, so that the young men of Polish origin who readily volunteered to fight on the side of the Allies so as to crush their ancient enemy should be returned as soon as possible to the United States.

I remember, in September, 1918, when there was held in New Britain, Conn., in Hartford County, which I have the honor to represent, a meeting of the friends of the Polish Legion at a big benefit for the Polish White Cross.

The new premier of Poland, Ian Paderewski, was present, and spoke in warm terms of the culmination of Poland's dream for freedom.

Hundreds of young men went out from Hartford, New Britain, and other Connecticut cities to join the Polish Legion. They went with the sanction of the United States. Some went early in the war and were recruited through Canadian sources and others later going directly from the United States. They knew that the President of the United States had expressed it as an axiom of world peace that Poland should have her freedom, and they felt rightly that in serving the United States they were serving Poland.

France and Great Britain at the time transported the men to Europe. The United States can hardly state that it will not return these men to their homes in America.

Mr. Chairman, the efforts of Poland in the war have been prodigious. Caught between the Russian autocracy, the German bureaucracy, and the Austrian monarchy, she nevertheless kept alive the light of freedom, and the world as well as herself is to be congratulated on her success.

I trust the present measure will prevail and that these men will soon be among us again.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MOSES P. KINKAID,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 21, 1920,

On the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10453) to provide for the termination of Federal control of railroads and systems of transportation; to provide for the settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees; to further amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, some are in doubt as to how the pending bill will operate if enacted, but this is the way with all legislation. Extended hearings and seemingly very mature deliberations have been accorded the measure, and the time will have arrived in a few days when the roads are to go back to their owners pursuant to the proclamation made by the President December 24, 1919, for their return to private ownership March 1. By virtue of this presidential proclamation the roads will be returned to private ownership on the date named, independently of any act of Congress. The purpose of the pending measure is to facilitate their return and to promote successful operation thereafter. It has been made clear by the hearings that without the help of the provisions contained in the pending bill, financial and otherwise, the roads would not be able to function very long, but would go into the hands of receivers.
